ilities are limited; the distances are short; the rate is cheaper; the size of the package allowed to be sent is larger; and Mr. Fawcett has arranged for the delivery of parcels in the cities by wagons—a point we have not reached here.

One cent an ounce, this costs sixty-four cents. Here, if the package is going to the other martial case of Capt. John A. Kress, ordnance department, who is situated at the war department to-day.

The English system extends to any part of England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, but the whole territory is small as compared with the vast extent of our postal system.

The system has been in use here several years, and was for a time a source of great dissatisfaction to the post office department.

An interesting change has taken place in this respect, and it was proposed until recently that the merchandise mail represented a heavy loss annually to the government.
