Delightful Picnic at Hascall's

The Day Auspicious and the Picnic

The picnic arranged some weeks ago for the German School Association, and postponed once on account of the weather, took place at Hascall's park Sunday

The sky looked threatening all day and the visitors were slow in assembling, but towards evening crowds thronged to the spot and the occasion proved altogether a social and financial success.

Hascall's park is one of the pleasantest resorts in the city, its clean bright lawns, shaded walks, pavilions and dancing "The doctors doing her no good;"
"And at last was cured by this Hop Bitters the papers say so much about."
"How there the papers are so much about."
"How there the papers are so much about." this occasion was made up from their choicest selections. The object of the picnic was a praiseworthy one and drew the best sort of people.

The gentlemen wore red and white ribbons as badges while ladies were, with the usual courtesy accorded them, admitted free. The dancing in the evening was most enjoyable, the weather turning out fine and not a single thing occurring to mar the pleasure of the day. The various committees did their duty well and all in all the affair could not have been better managed or made more of a success.

BISMARCK STILL ACTIVE.

His Early Life Prophetic of His Future Career.

From the London Standard. It is pleasant to find that, in spite of all his ailments—his gout, his neuralgia, his sciatics, his threatenings of jaundice, and of apparently all the ills which flesh is heir to—Prince Bismarck is still capable of carrying himself back in spirit to his old college days, and exchanging characteristic greetings with those passing their boyhood where his was once spent. The short halt made at Gottingen, as the great statesman was on his way south famous in this country by Canning's lines even before Bismarck was out of the nursery, trooped to the platform of the station to greet the "Great Man," and their hocks were so loud and enthusiastic that they compelled the illustrious traveller to emerge from the recesses of his railway carriage. After a few words with the Burgomaster the Prince turned to the students who had come to do him honor, but here was the here of all these students who had come to do him honor, and the restoration of German unity. Yet here was the hero of all these great achievements, the foremest man of and began that little volley of terse and pointed observations for which all his age—worn out by anxieties and who have been brought into con- broken down in years-looking once tact with him are aware he is famous. He is one who remains silent or life. Like Byron, on a similar occasion, the students had a new deep gash across his face, and it was easy for the Chancellor, from the recollection of his own "Freshman" days, to guess what was its origin. Accordingly he bantered the young fellow on having, no doubt, fought

Bismark's rooms the young student was walking homeward with his dog, when four students of the Hanover Corps thought propper to laugh as he passed them. "Are you laughing at me?" asked Bismarck, already not in the best humors. The reply was that he must be very blind if he did not see that they were. He answered with the "retort acourteous," and challenged all four. He had already fought one duel, his first, with a young Jew of the name leg, Bismarck retaliating by cutting off Wolf's spectacles. But the duel was what a popular female novelist called the Hanoverian "quadrilatecial" never came off, for they saw what good student-stuff he was made of, they asked him to join their
