It is true he has not permanently injured Massachusetts, as her institutions are strong. The disgrace was in electing him. The State will look back in shame upon this wild Butler folk when Butler is in dust. The Democrats of Massachusetts will rue the day when, in defiance of principle and honor and for the hope of spoils, they allowed such a demagogue to capture the highest office in the State. COMMENTS OF THE PRESS. The Reasons for Rejoicing. CHICAGO, November 7.—The Tribune says editorially: The Republican party has much reason to rejoice over the result of the election yesterday. In Massachusetts Ben Butler, a pestiferous demagogue and one of the dangerous men lately prominent in American politics, is unquestionably defeated. It was not a question of majorities in Massachusetts, but of Butler was the object aimed at and it was accomplished. In spite of his vile charges against the management of Republican institutions, and possibly in consequence of them, he was refused a re-election. The issue was not the same as if he had been seeking a re-election as governor on the same terms as Mr. Robinson. He had served one term as Governor of Massachusetts, and it is true he has not permanently injured Massachusetts, as her institutions are strong. The disgrace was in electing him. The State will look back in shame upon this wild Butler folk when Butler is in dust. The Democrats of Massachusetts will rue the day when, in defiance of principle and honor and for the hope of spoils, they allowed such a demagogue to capture the highest office in the State.
