FELL AND HANLEY were in waiting with their trainers. They boarded the train which, after some delay, moved on across the Platte River, distant about a mile, into Saunders county.

By this time it was nearly five o'clock and the gray dawn was appearing. When the train had left the river behind about Fell is Declared the Winner, a half a mile it was stopped on a little rise of ground, overlooking a beautiful piece of low land. Here several of the party got out and selected a suitable spot upon which to pitch the ring. After a little time a site was chosen.

A TWENTY-FOUR FOOT RING was measured off. The rope and stakes were brought from the train and the work of constructing the ring begun. the work had been about half completed a squad of was seen coming across river. Fearing that they might be officers of the law the ring was torn down, and a couple of men were sent out to as-certain who they were. They proved to be only citizens of Valley, who were coming over to see the fight. The ri g wat then re-constructed and the enclothen brought from the train nhich was distant not more than thirty rods. They had changed their ordinary apparel for fighting suits, while the ring was being formed. The morning being quite chilly, Fell had wrapped himself in a bedtime honored custom of tossing the cap or "shying the castor" into the ring. The backers of Fell and Hanley now entered the ring and tossed up for the choice of corner, Hanley winning, and choosing the southeast corner. By this time the morning beams of the sun were shedding their warmth, but not sufficient to keep the men from getting cold. Their legs were constantly rubbed, and jured. His principal injuries were about his breast and ribs. Hanley directed all his blows at his opponent's body. while those of Fell were aimed at his antagonist's face and head. Hanley was badly used up. The severest blows that he received were two on the left ear, from which he bled profusely. He was considerably marked in his face and about his head. The friends of Hanley were somewhat disappointed in his work with his hands. In his "science" he did not come up to their expectations. They supposed he would be far superior to Fel in this particular, but in almost every instance Fell excelled Hanley. Fell's power of endurance was also much greater than that of Hanley. During the Lewis Bradford. last five or six rounds Hanley showed signs of weakness, and his blows did not have the telling effect that they did in the early part of the fight. Throughout the entire mill Fell always came to the Charlton, S. P. Morse, Jacob Strickler, scratch promptly and met Hanley threejuarters of the way.

During the 17th round two men, representing the two factions, got into a dispute, which ended in several of Hanley's riends chasing the Fell representative off the field for some distance. Revolvers were drawn, and the men around the ring scattered for fear of being shot. The difficulty, however, was temporarily adjusted, and the mill proceeded.

During the fight Hanley spiked Fell's feet several times, and whenever Fell sure made level. Hanley and Fell were was thrown or forced down Hanley would would wait to be taken off by his seconds. It was on that account that Fell's backers claimed several fouls, and Hanley was warned by the referees that if he did not quit such work, Fell would be given the night. He repeated his tricks in the quilt, and Hanley had put on a couple of heavy coats. Before they entered the ring, however, some one performed the fight was given to Fell. Immediately after the decision in favor of Fell, the ropes were taken down, and the whole party returned to the train, which started for Omaha about 7:30.

HOMEWARD BOUND.

It was evident to the most casual observer that trouble was brewing among the roughs and toughs, and that only the slightest cause would explode the pent-up wrath. The first thing that was done their bodies were manipulated to keep after the train got in motion was the division of the purse of $300, which had been fought for. It had been agreed that the winner should receive $250, and the loser $50. The stakeholder, under the decision of the referees, gave Fell his money, but Hanley refused to accept his portion. The Hanley faction gave vent to their contempt for the referees, and made quiet threats of vengeance. The Fell faction was jubilant, and hilarious. During the first few miles from Clear Creek, several altercations took place, but the fighting did not betook place, but the fighting did not betook place, but the fighting did not become general. When the train was within a short distance of Waterloo, a young man named Marks, a confidence shark known to the Omaha police, got into a fight with an acquaintance, whose name cannot be leaded of the language of the be learned. They were finally separated, but in a few minutes they went at it again. In a moment it seemed as if every man in the car was fighting.

PISTOLS WERE DRAWN.

SEVERAL PISTOL SHOTS were heard and those standing on the outside and at the windows could see the flashes and the smoke. The bell card was pulled, the engine bell sounded and the train slowed up. One or two of the leading spirits were advised to leave the train for fear of their lives. They accordingly

The doctor stooped over him to ascertain the nature of his injuries and had the pleasure of looking down the chambersof a 44-calibre revolver. The doctor retreated from the car, but went back finally and examined the man's wounds. He was found to have received a pistol shot wound just back of the ear. He was taken back to the caboose and cared for. It was also found that Marks had been shot in the jaw, and that Jack McClellan, a saloon keeper of this city, had received a flesh wound in the right arm. After considerable delay at Waterloo the train started for Omaha. Several of the chicken-hearted, however,

Many people of this city are holding the gambling fraternity responsible for the prize fight, but the proprietors of the leading gambling places emphatically re-pudiate the whole business, and say that they do not in any way countenance prize-fighting. They did not attend it, nor did any of their employees, nor did they aid it by purchasing tickets. The whole affair is charged up to the pugilistic ele-ment in this city, which is a branch of the "sporting fraternity" that has been allowed to grow and flourish here until it has become dangerous.
