SCARED TO DEATH.

How a Sixth Infantry Soldier Died at Santiago.

"Do you see that name, William S. Sims, on the tablet up there?" said an officer of the Sixth infantry, pointing to the Sixth Infantry tablet on the face of the water tower at Fort Thomas, reports the Cincinnati Enquirer. "Well, I want to tell you something very queer concerning the death of that man at Santiago.

"Sims had gone through the hellish fight on the 1st of July, through all the firing while we were in the trenches up to the night of the 9th, when he was on outpost duty. The outpost of each company consisted of an officer, noncommissioned officer and three men. This detail was posted outside the trenches toward the enemy to prevent a party sneaking up on the trenches. One man on post was posted about fifty yards in front of the rest of the party, that lay down, one man being on the alert to listen to the low call of the sentinel if he heard anyone coming toward him. Well, about 10:30 o'clock that night two shots rang out in rapid succession, and all was excitement in a moment, as there had been no firing since early in the afternoon and all but a few were asleep, worn out with the strain of the last eight days.

"Running up to that part of the firing line whence the shots were heard I saw several men handing down over the top of the embankment the body of a man. The doctor was with me and he asked where the man was shot. The lieutenant who was in command of the outpost said: 'He is not wounded, but he is dead, just the same,' and so it proved. The doctor made a careful examination, aided by the bright starlight, and not a wound was to be found on the man, but his heart was still in death.

"What was the matter? Heart disease. It shut off like lightning, and Sims never knew what killed him. The men of the party say they were all lying down asleep except one man. He says when the sentinel fired the shot at a supposed Spaniard approaching all the sleeping party sprang up at once except Sims, who sat up and then immediately lay back again. The party rushed to the support of the sentinel and on their return found Sims, as they supposed, asleep again, and on shaking him found him not asleep, but dead. The doctor said no doubt the man had been on such a strain for the last few days that his weak heart simply stopped when he was awakened with such a start, and he fell back a dead man, to await the sounding of Gabriel's reveille, for he had heard the last of the trumpets of the gallant Sixth."

A Give-Away.

Chicago News: "Ah, major," said the stately woman under the palm, "you have been down on your knees before that southern coquette?"

"Madam!" retorted the major, hotly, "I'd have you to know that I don't kneel before women. I am too sharp for that."

"But you are not sharp enough to remove the dust from your knees," responded the tantalizer.
