

A Story Almost As Old As The Prairie... Smart Mom Helps Junior Help Himself...

It was a bright afternoon as The Frontier photographer drove across a stretch of snow covered prairie early this week. The sun had melted the snow—there was only an inch on the ground now.

And then, just over the rise of a small hill, a lesson was being learned. A newborn calf was trying to get up.

The lesson has been learned thousands upon thousands of times on this prairie and the elements were kind to the calf this time.

The snow was not cold, the mother was warm and the wind was no stronger than the soft panting breath of the calf.

The photographer had seen the stumbling ritual many times before, but this time he was ready as he snapped his camera open and recorded the scene.

Mama was cooperative, she watched the photographer but was occupied with the lesson to be taught at the moment.

Junior tried, and failed, tried again, and failed again, and then succeeded.

The calf was hungry, but mama was smart with the ways of the thousands of mamas that have taught the lesson on the prairie.

She couldn't have said it, of course, but she must have been thinking it all the same. "If your hungry son, you'll have to walk to get it."

Come on Junior, let's get up...

How about a little chow first..?

You'll have to walk first, son...
