4,000 miles to bring you one man's dream

In 1879, the year Thomas A. Edison invented the first practical incandescent lamp, people ridiculed his suggested plan to string wire from a central generating plant to homes so that everyone might enjoy man's first, truly efficient source of electric light. However, true genius that he was, Edison was determined that his new discovery should work to the benefit of all-not just a privileged few.

The year 1954 bears witness to the fact that Edison's dream of seventy-five years ago, the dream of a better way of life for the common man, is now a fact—a fact accepted as commonplace by millions of American families. Today, in Nebraska, Consumers Public Power District operates and maintains more than 4,000 miles of transmission lines to bring Edison's dream of seventy-five years ago-low-cost electric light and power-to more than 350 Nebraska communities.
