Modern Oakland

There was an interesting item in the paper the other day about a delegation from Oakland, Nebr., which went to Lincoln and called on Governor Anderson, urging that Highway 77 be by-passed around their town.

Whether the delegation represented a majority of the people of Oakland, we don't know, but certainly it represented the most modern thinking about highways.

If highway travelers want to do some shopping or buy an ice cream soda, the distance into town is not too great; they will make the trip. But if they are only intent on getting someplace else, open country provides a better and safer route.

Towns which demand that highways go through them are simply behind the times. The modern practice is to by-pass, and provide adequate access roads for those who want to stop.
