Out of Old Nebraska ... Doubted Land Could Sustain Population

Settlers Urged to Plant Trees

By DR. JAMES C. OLSON
Supt., State Hist. Society

Arbor day has particular significance for all Nebraskans, because arbor day, perhaps more than any other single occasion, symbolizes the spirit of pioneer Nebraska.

When the first settlers entered this area west of the Missouri, they were moving into a land vastly different from that known by earlier generations of American pioneers. Where the earlier areas of pioneering had been heavily forested, this land was treeless, or virtually so. There was considerable doubt that it would ever sustain an agricultural population. Indeed, official opinion held that it very definitely would not, and for a generation Nebraska had simply been part of the "great American desert."

The early pioneer farmers soon proved that a land where tall grasses grew in great profusion would produce crops in almost equal profusion.

Moreover, the land lay ready for the plow — no laborious clearing was required here before farming could begin.

This much was good but trees were sorely missed by those pioneer Nebraskans who had come from the wooded regions of the East and almost from the beginning Nebraska's agricultural leaders worked energetically to encourage the planting of trees on Nebraska's farmsteads and in her villages.

No one worked more energetically than the author of arbor day himself. One of the first improvements on the claim near Nebraska City that was to develop into Arbor lodge was the planting of trees. In addition to planting trees on his own place J. Sterling Morton worked tirelessly to encourage others to follow his example.

The columns of the Nebraska City News which he edited were filled with advice and encouragement. In 1865 he wrote that the groves and orchards of Oteo county conclusively demonstrated, "the fact that sufficient timber can be grown upon a quarter section of prairie land in the course of six years, to furnish the dweller thereupon a bountiful supply of firewood, and yet leave him 120 acres of prairie to cultivate."

The Nebraska State Horticultural society, organized in 1869, reflected the growing interest in fruit trees among the pioneer farmers. The society's meetings provided an opportunity for the fruit growers of the state to get together to share experiences and exchange views.

This was important because practical experience was their only reliable guide. They had little scientific information.

Hence, when arbor day was established in 1872, Nebraskans had been working for almost two decades to improve tree culture in the territory and state, and arbor day, in the beginning, was simply one of a number of efforts to encourage the planting of trees in Nebraska. So expressive was it of the hopes of the pioneers, however, that it soon became a legal holiday, and spread far beyond the borders of Nebraska.

As its founder was fond of saying: "Other holidays repose upon the past; arbor day proposes for the future."

Holt Fair Is $500 Richer

The Holt county fair at Chambers was $500 richer this week, when Ak-Sar-Ben mailed a check for that amount to be used for fair grounds improvement.

President Lloyd Gleed and Secretary Edwin A. Wink of the Holt County Agricultural society said the Ak-Sar-Ben grant and the county's matching fund, will be used for a 4-H exhibit building.

Granting of $500 to each of Nebraska's county fairs is being continued for the second consecutive year by Ak-Sar-Ben, Omaha civic organization. This is the latest of a series of projects of financial assistance to county fairs, and resulted last year in statewide improvements valued at nearly a quarter of a billion dollars, according to J. L. Thurmond, a governor of Ak-Sar-Ben and chairman of its public affairs committee. The grants are made possible by funds from Ak-Sar-Ben annual race meeting.

The popular county fair improvement program follows the "dollar-matching" principle, in that Ak-Sar-Ben agrees to put up $500, provided the people of each county also raise at least an equal amount.

In 1954, most of the 71 counties that took advantage of the grants raised far more than $500, resulting in greatly increased facilities. Many new buildings were constructed, including livestock exhibit buildings, 4-H activities buildings, dining rooms and kitchens, grandstands, stages and many other needed facilities.

In addition to the $500,000 Ak-Sar-Ben sets aside each year for the new improvement program, it makes available approximately $75,000 a year for county fair premiums, part through the state racing commission and part paid directly to exhibitors by Ak-Sar-Ben. According to Mr. Thurmond, Ak-Sar-Ben plans to continue these projects as long as the money is available for it.
