'Vitamin X' Boon to Hooper

Shortly after 9 o'clock last Thursday morning, 67-year-old Smokey Cameron entered The Frontier office for a copy of last week's issue which related his story in a front page feature. Because Smokey's initial visit on Wednesday afternoon was cut short by a busy editor laboring close to the news deadline, the colorful, slightly bent nomad returned the next morning and began impressing the office gals with more tales of the open road. Once while hitchhiking from Los Angeles, Calif., to San Diego he was carrying his heavy pack, which weighed 75 pounds. Around his waist was strapped his gun and holster (being open country it is lawful to wear a gun).

While plodding along under his heavy load, a shiny new roadster whizzed by at a terrific rate of speed. As soon as he was passed him, the driver slammed on the brakes and backed up to where Smokey was standing and asked him if he wanted a ride.

Since his load was heavy, he accepted a ride with the smartly dressed driver. Smokey said, "I had no more than gotten in the car and we headed down the road when I think every state highway patrolman and sheriff in California was upon us. I was soon to learn that this man had just robbed a bank and had stolen the car we were riding in. I explained that he had picked me up and they said they had seen him stop for me. They let me go."

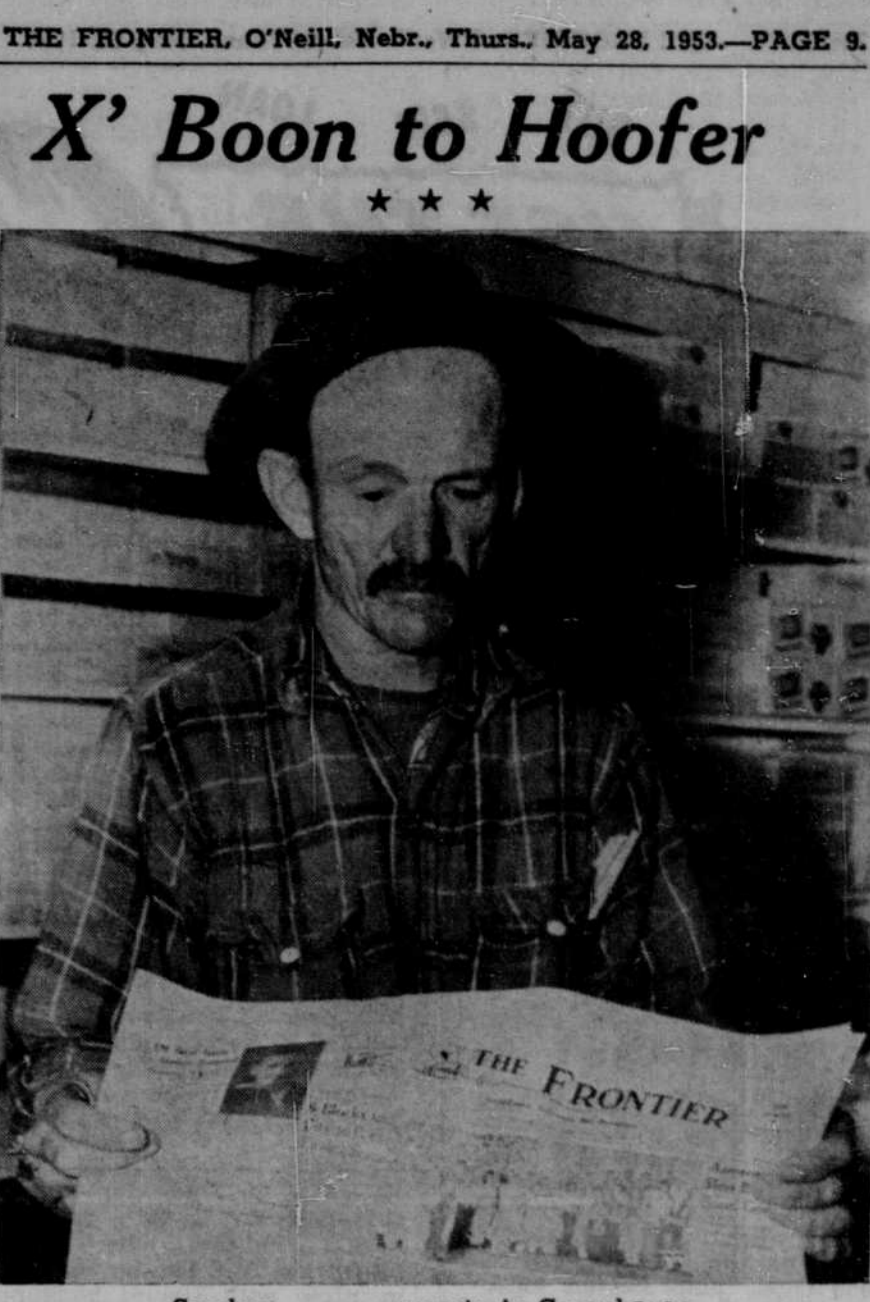

Smokey earns part of his money by writing his own stories or giving editors facts for stories for which they compensate him.

In a Texas town, Smokey asked an editor if he wanted a story. The editor said he would pay him five dollars for it but he would have to write it himself. As Smokey began on the story the editor began telling Smokey what a disgrace it was to be hitchhiking all over the country. Smokey began to defend himself and the editor stated, "It's a disgrace for an editor to alrman like you to be hoofing it around the country." Smokey laughed heartily with the editor. Said Cameron: "I meet a lot of different people."

While talking, he took out his can of Copenhagen and put some in his mouth. He said it contained vitamin X. "That's the vitamin that contains the secret things all the rest of the vitamins don't have." He said one fellow picked him up for a ride because he had seen his picture in the local paper. The driver added, "I never pick up hitchhikers, but I recognized you from the picture so I stopped." Smokey answered, "If that was the only reason you stopped, you didn't need to. I don't want those kind of rides."

Smokey said he always tries to attend the Baptist church every Wednesday night, but since O'Neill didn't have a church he would have to miss that Wednesday. He carries a Bible with him and during all his years of traveling, he has missed church less than 20 times.

This slender man, a little over five feet tall, was full of eagerness to begin his next adventure. From here he went to Omaha and from there was to continue on to Maine where he will join a friend. Together they will make Smokey's second trip to Alaska. Smokey said he would send The Frontier a story now and then to keep folks in touch with his travels. He said he wrote the stories but he had a public stenographer type them for him because when he types it is "hunt and pick."
