Outside the hut the Texans were employing a rare, custom-built refractometer (one of the first ever built), which measures the fluctuations in the refractive index in the air.

Stated for a layman to understand, Kenneth Jehm explained: "As light rays go through the air they tend to bend. You can measure the angles with this instrument," and he pointed to a compact, multiunit electronics device equipped with honeycomb, dials and red-inked charts positioned out in a nearby field.

Simply to breathe on the unit sets up a violent reaction on the charts. The instrument is used primarily to measure the refractive index of radio, radar and television waves rather than light waves.

"The meteorological importance of the refractometer," Jehm said, "is in the fact that the rapid changes in the refractive index are caused almost entirely by moisture in the air."

The small Texas staff maintained living quarters in the hut to keep the equipment manned around the clock.
