Out of Old Nebraska . . . Hastings College Opened in 1882

Ticklers

By JAMES C. OLSON Supt., State Historical Society One sultry August day in 1873, according to Dean Frank E. Weyer's fine book, "Presbyterian Colleges and Academies in Nebraska," 3 friends were visiting in a little frontier store located at what was to become the corner of Hastings avenue and First street in the city of Hastings. One of them said to the other 2: "Why not have a Presbyterian college at Hastings?" The pioneer settlers of Hastings immediately took hold of the idea. The 2 town companies, representing the B. & M. and St. Joseph railroads, subscribed a total of 40 acres for a campus, plus a large number of business and residence lots. The potential assets

The middle 1870's, though, were years of great and widespread depression in Nebraska, and the state Presbyterian synod felt unable to assume responsibility for an institution of higher learning far out on the second floor of the Chilcote building, located at what is now the corner of First street and Hastings avenue.

As a result, the project lan-guished—but not the enthusiasm of the people of Hastings, and particularly that of the members Irene, of Clarkson, came Wed-In 1879 they resumed plans for a college. These plans resulted in the appointment of a board of trustees who, on May 10, 1882, completed the organization of trustees who complete the org

Hastings college.
The college formally opened on September 13, 1882, with a chapel service in the First Presbyterian church. The first faculty was turned home Saturday afternoon composed of 5 members, 2 of whom served only part-time. A total of 44 students enrolled the October 8. first year, all in the secondary department.

The first building at Hastings college was made possible through the generosity of Cyrus H. McCormick. The building bearing his name was ready for use at the opening of the fall term in 1884, and Hastings college was firmly established on its own campus.

Though 3 years of doubt and uncertainty — resulting in the main from the depressed condition of prairieland agriculture — the college, under able and devoted leadership, continued to grow. New buildings were added and a larger faculty was employed to serve the needs of the growing student body.

In 1934, Hastings college took over the records and property of the defunct Bellevue college, a pioneer Presbyterian institution located near Omaha.
