Prairieland Talk

(Continued from page 2) in the lordly elm by my window. Warm waves at intervals from the gas furnace overshadow the chill of early autumn. Light from electric bulbs dispels the gloom. I pick up a volume and turn the pages. Among the ghosts of the past stand four white-haired old men, old men who held in their hands the destiny of civilization. President Wilson, Clemenceau, Orlando, Lloyd George. Mr. Wilson proposed to hand to the people of earth a League of Nations that would guarantee "a permanent peace based on unselfish, unbiased justice." The French, the Italian, the English branches of the Big Four looked upon this proposal as a benevolent dream. Europe knew only the mailed fist. Mr. Wilson's "benevolent dream" evaporated into thin air and he died a broken, disillusioned old man. Again we ride high on another benevolent dream under the flag of United Nations, while the mailed fist is the court of last resort.

By the time they have reached 40 in bachelorhood they should be heart whole and fancy free. The dispatches reported the other day that one of that age of culture and prominence took his life rather than endure the pangs of unrequited love.

Once it was thought smart to sock the rich. The Fair Deal is doing an admirable job of socking it to the babies. A nickel's worth now costs 19 cents, a raise of 3 cents just today, one instance of what is happening to the household budget in cities as an outgrowth of "price supports" contrived down at Washington.

A full page ad in one of those gaudy magazines claims their particular make of fags is the choice of most doctors. A stooped, horse-faced and flabby old man asked a young fellow the other day if he smoked. The answer was "No." With a fag hanging in his face the old man said, "Boy, don't you ever start."

If kids were required to put the effort into productive labor they do into chasing one another with a football there would be a roar of protest and probably some adult led by the collar into court to face a judicial decree imposing penalties for enforcing child labor. Bruised shins, caved-in ribs and the like seem to be preferred to blistered hands acquired earning
