134,000 Seedlings Planted in 1950

Cooperators with soil conservation districts in Nebraska planted over 2 1/2 million trees during the last year. This is a sizeable increase over the 1949 plantings, which in turn exceeded those of the previous year by a good margin.

The Holt Soil Conservation district planted nearly 134,000 trees in 1950 as compared to 113,000 in 1949, and 83,000 in 1948. The way orders have been coming in this fall indicates are that next year will set another new record. The district has already sold out of some varieties of shrubs and others are going fast.

Tree plantings by districts cooperators had been on the upgrade all along since the organization of soil conservation districts. But a good deal of credit for the sharp rise in the last two years can be charged to the lessons learned during the exceptionally severe winter of 1948-'49.

Experiences by Nebraska farmers and ranchers at that time brought into sharp relief the protection afforded to farm families and livestock by property designed and located windbreaks.

Among the experiences reported were those of John Dick, of O'Neill, whose farmyard was kept relatively free of snow even during the severe storms. Clarence Ernst was able to get feed for his cattle without too much difficulty during the winter. M. F. Gribble, east of Chambers, was able to winter cattle in good shape because of good protection. Harvey Tompkins and Lewis Sobotka, both of Inman, believe their labor as well as dollars saved in cattle striking evidence of the value of good windbreaks and shelterbelts.

There was another side to the story too. Investigations by the Soil Conservation Service during that period showed that some tree plantings were a handicap because they piled up drifts just where they were not wanted. According to the reports, the unsatisfactory tree plantings had one or more serious faults.

Some did not have a shrub row along the tree branches. Some were not wide enough that is, had too few rows. These plantings usually were also lacing shrubs, rows, and caused serious drifting for long distances out. And some were too near the buildings, feed lots, or roads they were supposed to protect. The result was to have drifts piled at the most inconvenient places.

These experiences brought out sharply the need for proper design and location of tree plantings. Aid in getting the right kind of tree planting at the right place is supplied as parts of farm conservation plans to cooperators with soil conservation district through the Soil Conservation Service technicians aiding them.

Part of the trees planted in windbreaks by farmers and ranchers cooperating with soil conservation district are supplied by the SCS. The rest may be bought from other sources. Among these are the Clarke McNary sources, usually through the county agent, and commercial nurseries. Holt district cooperators can make these purchases through their soil conservation district.

The Holt Soil Conservation District has two tree planting machines.

Legislative Grind Gets Underway

LINCOLN—The 1951 legislature grind is on.

Members of the 1949 legislature, sitting as the legislative council, met here last week, adopted a stack of reports from council committees and left behind the first measures to be framed by Bill Drafter Jackson Wilson.

Committee chairmen reported on a wide variety of subjects ranging from reorganization of state and county government to the Milford home for unwed mothers and from the regulation of the infant oil and gas industry to the statehouse coffee shop.

The council adopted most of the reports. Two notable exceptions were the ones on fair employment practices (which urged local option legislation) and one scrapping the office of the Spanish-American War veterans.

Lines Drawn

In an action packed three days, the 1949 legislators and several newly-elected members of the 1951 session, saw some battle lines drawn for the meeting which begins January 2.

Ray Babcock, of Sidney, to the surprise of no one, was tabbed the champion of legislation regulating the oil industry; Dwight Burney, of Hartington, took on the role of defender of the board of control; Karl Vogel, of Omaha, who is being touted for the chairmanship of the important budget committee, made his bid with a 154-page report on 22 state agencies and practices.
