Common Sense and Paint Can Stretch Toy Budget

THE jingle of Christmas bells is drowned out for many parents each year by the hollow jangle of the piggy banks which contain insufficient funds to provide the lavish gifts they'd like to provide for their families.

This year, instead of allowing worry to cloud your Christmas spirit, give a little thought in advance to solving this problem.

One way to make the holidays merry with little expense is to ask your relatives and neighbors to save for you any toys their older children may have outgrown and discarded.

If you have in your attic or basement playthings that have been tossed aside by big brother or sister, drag those out, too, to see if they can be fixed up for your younger children.

Often minor repairs with a hammer or screw driver will make "broken" toys restorable again. And a can of enamel can aid you in not only restoring their new look, but also in glamorizing them beyond their original state. Gay designs, such as those employed by Peter Hunt in his distinctive folk art, are particularly effective. These are easily done by using the basic tear-drop stroke recommended by Hunt.

As for toys purchased in the stores, let common sense be your guide. Give a bit of time in advance to observing your child at play, so you'll know exactly at what level his interests and abilities currently are.

Select soft stuffed toys for a child under two, but remember a big boy of five might be insulted at such a choice. Conversely, don't frustrate a three-year-old with puzzle games too complicated for his years; save those for the seven-year-olds on your list.

If the heart's desire of your child runs into dollars rather than cents, don't deprive him of it if you sanction his choice and can reasonably afford it.

If your budget simply won't stretch to cover it, try buying such things as electric trains piece-meal. With a starter set, he can get along until fancier gadgets can be added next Christmas or on his birthday.

It might also be a good idea to have him earn a part of the necessary money, in order to help him understand the true value of his expensive toys and hobby equipment.

An old wagon, a cast-off wheel barrow and other playthings painted in Peter Hunt's technique gleam bright and gay beneath the Christmas tree. The pieces were decorated peasant style with the tear-drop stroke recommended by Hunt.

Chambers Auxiliary

Holds Dinner — The American Legion auxiliary held a meeting and Christmas party at the Legion hall on Friday evening, December 1, with 19 members present.

The business session was conducted by Mrs. J. W. Walter. At this time plans were discussed for the dinner which was held Wednesday evening, December 6.

The Christmas program consisted of a song by Rose Marie Gibson, a song by Mrs. Ida Lambert, accompanied by Mrs. Lela Corcoran on the flute. Mrs. Margaret Cooper read a Christmas prayer.

There was an exchange of gifts. Refreshments were served by a committee composed of Mrs. Charles Spath, Mrs. Clarence Tibbets, Mrs. George Thomson, Mrs. Willard Thomson and Mrs. Merlin Grossnicklaus.
