Sen. Karl Vogel's Government committee began the procession with hearings on five bills, all submitted by Sen. John P. Knight, of Auburn. The five bills are simple corrective measures.

Although the first week necessarily had its share of ceremony with a minimum of business, the general tone for the session was pretty well established.

Governor Val Peterson came before the senators with one of the shortest inaugural speeches in the state's history. He asked only three things: One hundred thousand dollars to set up a state civilian defence agency, legislation providing for a 1,250 man state guard, and a freeze of all institutional building under the 1947 1.1 mill levy.

The governor spent much of his address in a discussion of the foreign crisis: "Ours must be a total preparation. All-out war could come to our shores at any time. No one knows where or when or how the next blow will fall but all expect it and dread it. Our greatest danger lies in the failure to see the situation clearly in confusion and in the refusal to understand that we cannot gain security and simultaneously enjoy all of the gadgets that characterize American life. We must recognize and make the sacrifices that are necessary."

The senators moved swiftly to give Mr. Peterson what he asked. Senators Earl Lee, of Fremont, Arthur Carmody, of Trenton, and Herbert J. Duis, of Gottenburg, submitted a $100,000 civil defence measure. Introducers of a state guard bill were Senators McKnight and Hugh Carson, of Ord, and Richard Marvel, of Hastings. Senators Vogel, Ray Babcock, of Sidney, and Glenn Cramer, of Albion, tossed in the measure freezing funds.

The bills were scheduled for hearing by committee this week.

The Governor didn't touch on two of the problems which have almost always been in inaugural messages: roads and money. Mr. Peterson said he would dwell in some detail on other aspects of state government in his budget message and in special communications to the legislature.

But already the problems were showing up. Senator Arthur Carmody, of Trenton, chairman of the important budget committee, estimated that state expenditures would rise 20 percent during the next biennium.

"You've got to remember," he told a reporter, "that one of the biggest problems we're dealing with now is that we're using Washington dollars and they've been cheapened somewhat."

As for roads, Senator Otto Prohs, of Gering, said he was going to re-introduce the one cent a gallon gas tax increase which the voters thumbed down in last November's referendum. And there were reports that bills would be forthcoming levying a ton-mile on trucks and stiffen-ing the penalties on truck overloading.
