Out of Old Nebraska—

Omaha 'A Very Dull Place' Except for Pike's Peak Emigration Passing Through

By DR. JAMES C. OLSON, Supt., State Historical Soc.

Among the thousands who thronged across Nebraska in the spring of 1859 to seek riches in the gold fields of the Rocky Mountains was E. H. N. Patterson, of Oquawka, Ill. He recorded his observations for the benefit of his hometown newspaper, and his diary was published by Leroy R. Hafen in "Overland Routes to the Gold Fields" (Arthur H. Clark Co., Glendale, Calif., 1942). As a result, we have a valuable contemporary account, not only of the Colorado gold rush, but of the state of civilization in the Platte valley during 1859.

Patterson had gone over the trail in 1850 and was much impressed with the changes that had been wrought in less than a decade. He was particularly struck with the progress of Omaha, where only empty prairie had greeted him in 1850. The territorial capitol, then in the process of construction, he described as "of magnificent proportions."

The town, though, seemed "quiet" and, he believed, would be, "a very dull place."

as to business, were it not for the Pike's Peak emigration passing through."

He followed the military road from Omaha to Ft. Kearny, and commented favorably on the good work the government had performed in the construction of bridges. At the crossing of Pappillion creek, he found a hotel. Elkhorn City was "beautifully located, contains a post office, and looks as though it would some day become the nucleus of a thriving farming settlement."

Fremont did not impress our journalist quite so favorably, and he described it as, "a Massachusetts settlement, which was originally quite small, and has grown 'beautifully less.'"

Columbus he found to be, "a little border village, containing 10 or a dozen houses, including a tavern, store and post office." Exorbitant prices charged at the ferry across the Loup, prompted Patterson to describe it as "considerable of a humbug."

Once across the Loup, settlements began to thin out, but in four days he did come to, "a German colony of two years standing, known as Grand Island City, containing 35 families, each possessing a separate homestead." Grand Island was the last civilian settlement of any size at all. Beyond, aside from Ft. Kearny, there were only occasional road ranches and way stations. Ft. Kearny, the most important stop on the trip, was, "a collection of frame and sod buildings, enclosing a handsome level square. The residences are for the most part residences and stables—there being no blockhouse. Several hundred soldiers are stationed here."
