Damage-Proof Plastics Take Over House

BY EDNA MILES

THE kitchen table, the center of family living in grandmother's day, has been steadily regaining its popularity in modern households since the introduction of plastic tops.

Junior can overturn his ink while doing his homework; Dad can spill ashes from his pipe; Mom can set down hot dishes without pads; Sister can smear fingernail polish around—all without damage.

These advantages, which the American public was quick to recognize, are now being made available in front-of-the-house furniture. There are plastic-surfaced pieces for the dining room, the living room, the bedroom, the terrace—almost any spot you can name.

Although this new furniture was inspired by mar-resistant kitchen equipment, there is nothing pantryish-looking about these new melamine laminates.

A number of new finishes have been achieved in designer-created pieces recently introduced.

There are real woods coated with plastic for extra durability, or woodgrains reproduced on photographic paper. The latter appear, to the casual eye, to be the real thing.

There are table and dressing table tops of fabric to match your draperies. These have been impregnated with melamine to make them glossy and lasting.

There are also treated papers in ebony-like black or pastels, and there are combinations of wood, fabric and paper in a novel, textural surface.

This dressing table top of striped drapery fabric laminated with white paper and melamine matches window hangings; is impervious to damage from spilled cosmetics or the lipstick message lady is writing.
