

Letters to the Editor

Dear Sir: In March three boys were arrested and fined for having two bottles of beer. Their names appeared in both papers and were put on the air for two days as possessing alcoholic beverages. Their parents hated the unfavorable publicity but felt, at the time, that if it taught the boys respect for the law and stopped minors from drinking it was worth it.

However, since then officers in a St. Patrick's night raid, found almost a dozen minors' cars to contain beer, they have had their "keg party" where participants were both trespassing and disturbing the peace, several boys were caught destroying school property and private farm property and last week two adults and a minor were arrested by a local officer for procuring and possessing beer, yet not one of these names were ever publicized.

Perhaps some fine point of the law makes it necessary to arrest some and not others, but I think if these otherwise law-abiding boys are to be taught respect and not resentment for the law, all should be treated the same.

Sincerely, A Reader
