A Poem From Mrs. Eby . . .

—While Mother Slept—
She dozed a bit by the evening lamp
And I watched in the softened light, For I saw with dismay that the bright, sweet face seemed suddenly worn tonight;
Seemed suddenly shadowed and very tired, I wondered if it could be That some of the shadows had deeper grown because of her care for me.
And some way I had not noticed before, the dear hands so seldom still.
But tonight as she rested a little I studied them there at will,
And I saw that her hands were worn with toil, And I saw through my tears how true Those hands had been in their tireless task for me the long day through.
And I wondered again if I had been more thoughtful, and had I borne
A greater part of the ceaseless toil, if her hands would have been less worn.
Then out of the pain of my heart there came a vow I meant to keep.
For I had learned a sorrowful lesson there while mother was fast asleep.
