SORRY VIRGINIA --

THERE IS NO SANTA!

Implicit in the thinking of too many people who urge federal aid for schools is the idea that there's some magical, painless way the national government can raise the money. Local and state taxes hurt because their impact is direct, but somehow or other raising federal funds isn't supposed to be any trouble at all.

Of course nothing could be farther from the truth. There's no Santa Claus for school support any more than there's one for any other private or governmental activity. Federal support might well shift the burden from certain taxpayers to others, but someone still has to pay the bill.

What's worse, federal aid has several disadvantages. For one thing, few states ever get back from Washington what they send in taxes. Administrative and collection costs always exact what has been termed Washington's "brokerage" for handling the money. In short, the same money kept and used at home would actually provide more school support.

For another, rare indeed is the federal program without onerous strings and conditions. It's no more than logical that any agency disbursing funds should take appropriate steps to see that the money is properly used. Who pays the piper calls the tune, and it's unrealistic to expect federal aid without commensurate direction and control.

Like most states, Nebraska has the resources to support excellent schools if they are properly used. Indeed, the state has no right to ask or expect outside support until it has put its own house in order.
