W. J. Froelich Featured In Book by Robsky

"The Last of the Untouchables," written by Paul Robsky with Oscar Fraley, co-author of "The Untouchables," tells the suspenseful story of what happened when a small band of dedicated men faced the vicious mob of the underworld.

The "Untouchables" were a legend, a symbol of honesty and courage against the jungle of gangsters in Chicago. In the midst of it all was the Assistant United States Attorney General, William J. Froelich, a native of O'Neill.

Paul Robsky, one of the nine original "untouchables" tells how he and his comrades worked hand in hand with "Bill" Froelich in an all out "war" against the Capone mob.

Froelich, who worked closely with the United States Attorney General Johnson, arrived in Chicago in 1929 to work out a unique scheme for importation of a hand-picked band of Prohibition agents who would be given a free hand and be accountable only to them.

Who these men were, and how they worked with Froelich to crack the Capone gang is the true story behind this book. It should be of special interest to local citizens as it gives an extant.

Mr. Froelich, born in York, was the son of Mr. and Mrs. William Froelich. He was six weeks old when the family moved to Inman, and five or six years later they moved to O'Neill. Here he grew up with his sister, Mrs. Ed Campbell, O'Neill, and his brother, Frank Froelich, O'Neill. Mr. Froelich graduated from the O'Neill schools and later married his wife, Irma, also of O'Neill. Their home still remains here.
