

School At Inman Now Open Again

The Inman Public School opened its doors Wednesday morning after being closed since Oct. 29. Grade school pupils had attended school Tuesday.

Coach Bill Miller, center of the school controversy which has split the Inman community, was present Wednesday until about 2:30 p.m. Following his departure in the afternoon a number of high school students were reported to have left also. At a meeting of the school board earlier it was voted 4-2 for dismissal of Mr. Miller and apparently the legality of the board's action is being questioned by Mr. Miller.

Mel Olson, consultant in school administration for the State Education Department was in Inman Wednesday to consult with school officials.

Mr. Olson also talked to the 24 remaining high school students in a closed assembly following the departure of Mr. Miller and the other students.

Present plans call for continuing school as normal but only the actions of the parents and students will determine whether this is possible.
