CONSUMERS PUBLIC POWER DISTRICT

This is a general view, looking north, of the Sheldon Station area. In the foreground is the Exhibit Building, with a group of visitors leaving for the parking lot to the south. Behind the Exhibit Building—actually some 200 yards to the north—is the Nuclear Reactor wing of the station. The tall structure at the left is the fuel loading building. In the far background (center left) are the water cooling towers for the conventional steam power facility.

In the Exhibit Building, visitors first see a complete cut-away scale model of the entire Sheldon Station, showing both the nuclear and conventional facilities. Other exhibits are also viewed here.

Visitors are able to see the huge reactor bay area through large plate glass windows. From here, they go to the second floor for a view of the large control room filled with dials and flashing panels, and the turbine-generator that will produce 75,000 net kilowatts of electric power.
