The Frontier Woman Tip: Save Labels on New Clothing

I don't know about you, but one of the tasks I like the least is sorting dirty clothes for machine washing. And yet, proper sorting of soiled laundry is the first part of doing a good laundry job. Clothes must be sorted in groups together so that fabrics in each group can stand the same water temperature, the same kind of soap, and the same washing time.

First of all, I separate the all white and light fast colors. This includes bed linens, table linens, both towels, white and colored shirts, dresses, underwear, hankies, aprons, dish towels, white and light colored socks and stockings, and bath mats.

When making these up into loads, I separate the heavily soiled articles from the lightly soiled ones and wash the lightly soiled pieces first, I try not to buy any of these things unless absolutely necessary.

Such articles as curtains, slip covers, draperies, chenille spreads, rugs and blankets should not be included in the weekly machine wash but washed separately and hand washable articles can sometimes be washed separately in the machine in lukewarm mild suds, but it is good thing to make sure they can be, before you do it.

Always save the label from articles you buy, because it usually has washing directions. Put it in a big manila envelope kept just for that purpose and then you'll be prepared for laundering the article properly.

When you sort clothes, remove heavily soiled hankies and soak in a pail of warm suds for 15 minutes. Add a bleach or other disinfectant for hygienic reasons. Look for stains as you sort clothes and remove them accordingly to directions if there are any. Close slide fasteners, lest they catch and damage other articles. Try to train the family to clean out pockets of clothes before the clothes are put into the soiled clothes hamper, but make sure they have done so while sorting the clothing.

Use soap jelly in spots of stubborn soil, shirt collars and cuffs, necklines of dresses, apron fronts. Dissolve one cup of good laundry soap in enough boiling water (about three cups) to make a thick jelly. Apply with a soft-bristled brush or a terry washcloth.

Remove all perishable trims that might fade from the garment. Shoulder pads usually need to be removed, too. Most articles need to be mended before washing because some things, such as sheets, have so much weight and size that washing them will make them tear more. Holes and tears in knitted items should be caught in prevent unraveling.
