Echoes from the Valley

Postoffices Never Die

By Mrs. Merrill Anderson
The final chapter is being written and two more old landmarks are being added to the list as the Dorsey and Star postoffices close their doors to the public.

These, along with our rural schools and churches, are being out-classed by a progressive movement toward betterment of our people.

In some instances, we are skeptical about the possible results. However, in view of the many advancements made since these postoffices first started, it is quite evident they are no longer essential to their communities and no financial gain is realized.

As we trace the history of the Dorsey postoffice, we learn it was first designated Apple Creek, named for the stream on which banks it stands. Incidentally the stream was thus named because it was one of two streams in Nebraska which boasted of productive crab apple trees. Some time during the 80's the name was changed to Dorsey, named for George W. E. Dorsey, a congressman from 1885 to 1891.

In the beginning, the mail was brought daily by stage across the Missouri from the little village of Running Water at the end of the railroad, a distance of approximately 25 miles. Supplies of all kinds came that way by wagon. Immigrants began to move in, settling along the stream where food and shelter were advantageous. In 1890 the settlers numbered around 100, in about one-half section. A promising city was developing, boasting of three stores, a harness shop, blacksmith shop, drug store, hotel, livery barn, flour mill, all which long ago closed the doors.

There was a one-room school with enrollment of 60 pupils, ranging in age from 6 to 20 years with one teacher for all. The school term lasted but three months.

Little published data has been found on the Star postoffice but to my knowledge it was established about the same time as Dorsey. Records note that the mail was carried from Star to Paddock in 1882 on horse-back by V. V. Rosencrans, father of H. V. Rosencrans, present postmaster at Redbird.

It might be of interest to note that under orders from the postal Department mail deliveries to citizens along the routes were started on July 1, 1902.

May I paraphrase General MacArthur?
Old postoffices never die; they just fade away.
