

Carpenter Forces Budget

LINCOLN — Gov. Victor Anderson's "hard tack" budget is becoming of more interest to state senators daily.

There are two schools of thought in the legislature on the governor's budget and how responsible the chief executive is for it.

By custom, the governor early in each session of the lawmaking body, submits his recommendations for state spending for the next two-year period.

After the governor's recommendations are made, he loses control of the budget and whether it is lowered or increased is up to the legislature.

The problem came into sharp focus last week when Sen. Terry Carpenter of Scottsbluff was successful in an unprecedented vote by the legislature in forcing the budget out of committee.

But after an hour of wrangling during which the eight-member budget committee tried to resign, the lawmakers reversed themselves and left the budget with the committee.

The committee holds hearings most of a legislative session, then come in with its recommendations on the budget. These generally are followed by the other senators with little variance.

Carpenter's maneuver — if it had stood — would have brought the budget to the floor for debate, just the way the governor presented it, without public hearings.

This should be done, Carpenter argued, so the governor would be more responsible for his recommendations.

But Governor Anderson said that he cannot anticipate before a legislative session what bills will be introduced to either lower or increase his budget.

The two schools of thought on the governor and his relationship to the budget are:

That the governor's recommendations are merely a framework from which the legislators should proceed.

That the governor should be held accountable for increases in the budget which are caused by legislation.

In past years, the governor's budget has been a starting point for lawmakers and always has been increased by the senators.

This comes about through legislation that would require state appropriations.

But this session senators are keenly aware of the economy of the state and are generally more skittish about being placed in a position of going above the governor's recommendations, even though this has been done in the past.

The budget committee, headed by Sen. Karl Vogel of Omaha, has been working at a fast clip to get the budget in shape as soon as possible.

So far, the committee is a third of the way through public hearings on requests of state agencies.

Vogel said "substantial" reductions have been made from the governor's "hold the line" budget so far.

The governor commented on the floor discussion of his budget that last week was touched off by the Carpenter maneuver. Gov. Anderson said the discussion "proves the legislature is budget-conscious and wants to hold the line." And, the chief executive said he has "high regard" for the budget committee.

About Guard Ruckus
The ruckus between the defense department in Washington and the national guard has not escaped the scrutiny of the Nebraska legislature.

A statement by Secretary of Defense Wilson started the uproar. He said the guard has been used by draft dodgers.

Another bone of contention is an order that would require all guardsmen recruits to take six months of active duty.

A resolution was passed by the legislature 35-1 that said the Nebraska lawmakers view "with alarm and disapproval" defense department policies relating to the guard.

Then came a report from Washington stating that guardsmen "flunked" field tests when put up against regular army personnel. This drew fire from Maj.-Gen. Guy Henninger, commander of the Nebraska guard.

Henninger said of Nebraska's units seven were rated superior, 24 excellent and several others satisfactory during an inspection by a team of regular army officers.

Interpretation of the field tests, Henninger said, was "unfair" because guardsmen were tested on equipment and weapons upon which they had not been trained. The ironical part, he said, is that the army itself prescribes what training shall be given by the guard.

In many instances, guardsmen nationally outscored regular army personnel, Henninger said.

Robertson Case
A legislative committee, headed by Sen. Donald McGinley of Ogallala, will begin hearings on the case of Game Commissioner Don Robertson of North Platte soon.

McGinley said the hearings will get underway the week of February 18. The Ogallala senator said he is going to try to finish the investigation in one day.

Robertson was charged last year with shooting a quail from a public highway in Johnson county. The case was dismissed after Mel Steen, game commission director, ordered a warden to withdraw the charge.

Robertson has maintained he is innocent and that he did not know Steen was going to have the charge withdrawn.

Steen said he took the action because Robertson was being "persecuted, not prosecuted."

Since the incident, the case has flared repeatedly and some senators now say it may affect appropriation bills of the game commission unless the air is cleared.

Eying Scouts Gets 125 Clothing Bags

EWING—One hundred twenty-five bags of clothing were gathered on Saturday by Boy Scout troop 181 for the Goodwill Industries for the handicapped.

Scouts participating were Larry Noffke, Jerry Tams, Alfred Schiulsky, Virtus Lee, Jim Tams, Dan Rotherham Larry Tuttle and Ronald Cloyd.

A special thanks goes to Irvin Cloyd and Durwood Loughrey, who furnished pickup trucks when collecting the bags, and to Clifford Hahlbeck for general assistance, according to H. R. Harris, scoutmaster.

Kreiter Family Back in States

EWING—Mrs. Martha Hill received a telephone call from her daughter, Mrs. Valgene Kreiter, from California, on Thursday, stating that she and her family had arrived in the United States.

Mr. Kreiter, who is in the navy, has been stationed in the Philippine Islands for several months. He was joined by his wife and small son over a year ago.
