Tempers Shorten in Unicam

LINCOLN—The grueling legislative session is beginning to take its toll on senators—so far mostly on tempers.

When the last month of a session begins, there usually are some lawmakers who succumb to exhaustion. Others just plain have short tempers.

The Nebraska legislature is one of the most grueling in the nation. Most senators are members of two committees and spend four afternoons weekly in committee meetings, after debating about three hours in the morning.

After committee hearings are finished, as is the case now, senators spend five hours per day debating.

Veteran legislative observers know the session is in the home stretch when lawmakers begin scrapping on the floor over minor issues.

Tempers began flaring last week during argument on assistance bills.

The verbal exchanges, if the normal pattern is followed, will become more frequent as the session wears on.

Spending Big Topics Spending of money becomes the prime topic in waning days of a session with debate climaxed by action on the budget bill. The tone of this session has been economy and the lawmakers are smacking down with abandon bills dealing with increased appropriations.

The attitude is not consistent, however, and some measures calling for allocation of more funds, will make the grade.

But the money bills that get the green light on final vote are expected to be few and far between.

A big scrap appears in the offing over the University of Nebraska budget, which the budget committee has sharply trimmed from the amount sought.

The school would $5.5 million more, Gov. Victor Anderson recommended $3.2 million more, but the budget committee would go on only for a $2.2 million hike.

After consulting with the committee, Governor Anderson announced he would fight the committee's recommendations. The governor said the committee has made a more thorough study than he and should have more information.

The chief executive said he feels the committee has made cuts in his budget carefully and has not made "pencil" reductions.

Repeatedly, the governor has expressed confidence in the ability of the committee, which has met five times weekly since the session got underway.

Lawmakers plan a short Easter vacation before plunging into a pile of bills backed up on general file. That is the first point where measures are debated.

Page of the debate from now on will determine whether a record is set on length of a session. But most solons are hopeful adjournment can come around the first of June.

Work of the lawmakers received national attention last week when Life magazine did a story and series of pictures on the unicameral and its happenings.

The New Carpenter—One of the surprises of the current session of the legislature has been Sen. Terry Carpenter of Scottsbluff.

Carpenter, who does not mind being tabbed as "Terrible Terry," served one previous session in which he made strong attacks on the "big corporations," and individual senators.

But this term, the fiery Scottsbluff senator has held a firm check rein on his speech making. Gone from this session are the thundering 30 and 40 minute orations and the verbal blasts at other senators.

Carpenter, if there is a leader this session, has developed at least as one of the top parliamentarians of the session. He has been many times more successful with bills introduced, but especially in debating a measure.

His main theme this session has been to stop any more real estate taxes from being tacked on to what he termed an already overburdened populace.

Carpenter has stood firmly behind Governor Anderson's "hard tack" budget.

He has repeatedly said that the governor has told senators he can operate state government during the next two years on the budget the chief executive recommended.

Says the senator: "He should be given an opportunity to do so." Carpenter further adds that citizens should experience a "hard tack" budget of the variety the governor proposes.

And, Carpenter has told lawmakers that the people of his district told him in no uncertain terms to do everything he could to stop further real estate taxes.

Candidly remarked Carpenter: "I'm going to do everything, fair or foul to accomplish that end."

Can't Close Schools—State Education Commissioner Freeman Decker has said the state education department doesn't want authority to close the schools in the state.

There has been considerable controversy over state board of education decisions to list schools as "non-approved." That is, they no longer are exempt from the free high school tuition levy and cannot collect tuition from non-resident students.

Decker himself has been the object of an attack from the Nebraska Small Schools association. A visit to many schools in the state, Decker said, would show many pupils are not getting a good education.

Regarding the overall problem, Decker said: "The only concern of the department is that today's youngsters get the kind of education that will fit into today's complex world."

He said the department does not have—and doesn't want—authority to close schools in the state.

(Editor's note: In sandhills language, Decker's contention might be paraphrased: He doesn't want the bull to lose its virility and identity; he simply wants to make the bull into a steer.)
