Weed Question Requires Answer

This week's soil conservation question comes from Helen Margens of Emmet, asking: "If we go into a period of greater moisture for pasture, will the weeds that have started in so many places be killed out by grass or will the grass have to be re-seeded?"

Answer: It is natural that with the possible over use of pastures, even those properly stocked normally, during an abnormally dry season that weeds will appear to an alarming rate when periods of greater moisture return.

This is largely because the grass has been damaged by the dry season and over use and with added moisture something will grow in the voids.

This usually will be weeds for the first year but the grass will come back and take over without re-seeding, unless the range is damaged in other ways.

However, it is not to be construed that it is never beneficial to control weeds in grassland. Annual weeds or weedy grasses may be mowed in the early bud stage and will be reduced so that the native grasses will have a better opportunity to respond to the added moisture.

In case of very heavy infestation of perennial weeds it may be advisable to spray with chemicals for weed control. However, generally speaking, native vegetation, properly managed will crowd out the weeds until they are not a problem.
