equipment dealers became affiliate members of the National Association of Soil Conservation Districts.

Melvin Marcellus, Allis-Chalmers dealer, and Harry R. Smith, John Deere dealer, each contributed $25 to the Holt district treasurer, Elmer Allyn. These checks were forwarded to national headquarters at League City, Tex. Districts all over the nation are assigned a certain number of affiliate memberships to obtain on the basis of the number of cooperators of the district. Holt's share for 1952 was 2 affiliate members.

The national association feels that in general it is much better when locally interested individuals contribute than when the contribution is made from district funds.

Smith and Marcellus feel they are making more than a "donation." They believe that their money will be used to strengthen a local organization which in turn will bring about better farming and ranching methods and thus make a more prosperous community.

Mr. Smith remarked, "I'm not giving this money away, but making a small investment in the future of American agriculture."
