Wild Game Plentiful in Early Nebraska

When the early pioneers used to reminisce about the changes that had taken place in Nebraska during their years here, they frequently lamented the passing of the era of good hunting. Wild game was plentiful in old Nebraska, and hunting provided relief for the monotony of the daily tasks. A considerable portion of William Stolley's "History of the First Settlement of Hall County," published by the State Historical Society in 1946, is given over to tales of hunting trips in central Nebraska in the early 1860's.

Buffalo could still be found west of Grand Island, and each fall some of the men in the pioneer community would set out on a buffalo-hunting expedition to fill their family larders for the coming winter and to enjoy the sport. The story of the expedition of 1862 may be of interest.

Four men, including Stolley and Henry Viereg, went hunting that fall on Elm Creek, 30 miles west of Ft. Kearny. One morning they discovered six buffalo and Stolley and Viereg approached them carefully.

Taking cover in a dried up water course, they were able to get within 100 paces of the shaggy beasts. Though armed only with muzzle-loading guns, they brought down all six animals, one after another, without moving a step out of their position.

Stolley explained their success by the fact that they were down wind from their prey. The buffalo heard the shots, but being unable to see or smell the hunters, they soon resumed their feeding. It was a different story when the buffalo caught the scent of a human being—then they would flee when the hunter was miles away.

Even though game was plentiful, a successful hunter had to know the peculiarities of the game he sought. Deer, like buffalo, had a keen sense of smell, and depended very little upon their eyes.

Antelope however, were difficult to hunt because of their extraordinarily sharp sight. Tenderfeet there were in those days as there are today. Stolley tells of one of the early pioneers following rabbit tracks in the snow in the direction from which the rabbit came!

"A hunter of that sort," he wrote, "even if in possession of the best of arms, naturally would have starved in the midst of thousands of buffalo, elk, and antelope had not the Town Company furnished the food and other people carried him along."

Go-Ahead on Deer Hunting Is Given
Nebraska's buck and doe deer hunting seasons will get under way as scheduled. This important announcement was made on Friday by the Nebraska game commission at its meeting in Lincoln. Decision to hold the seasons as originally scheduled was made upon completion of an extensive study. Chief factors influencing the game commission action were:

• Extreme fire consciousness shown by hunters throughout the state.
• Realization of necessity to harvest deer crop to reduce crop depredation.
• The buck season gets under way Monday, December 1, and runs through December 7. The doe season starts on December 8 and continues through the 14th.

A total of 1,500 hunters will seek bucks in Banner, Morrill, Scottsbluff, Sioux, Sheridan and Dawes counties. Doe hunters, 1,000 strong, will hunt the same counties with the exception of Sheridan which is closed to doe hunting.
