Fertilizers May be in Short Supply

Despite estimates that there will be a greater commercial fertilizer production this year than in 1952, the material will be about as hard to get as last year, according to University of Nebraska agronomists. Estimates that there will be a production of 12 percent more nitrogen, 10 percent more phosphate and 19 percent more potash. The agronomists say, however, that greater use of the plant food by farmers will offset the increased production. The agronomists advise farmers to order their commercial fertilizer early to be sure of having it on hand when seeding operations begin next spring. County Agent A. Neil Dawes suggests that you get the soil from your fields tested before applying fertilizer. Barnyard manure is worth $3 to $4 per ton. This year instead of how many loads hauled out, make it how many acres covered. He recommends using 3 to 6 tons of manure per acre. If you set the spreader to spread as thin as possible and you can see where you have gone in a stubble field, it is estimated you are applying between 3 to 4 tons per acre. The agent points out that barnyard manure adds both nitrogen and phosphorus and in addition adds the much needed organic matter to sandy soil which helps in water holding capacity. Remember, manures are valuable to you.
