A DUEL AT DINNER.

Thrilling Episode of the Early Colorado and New Mexico Days. In the early days of the Pike's Peak excitement the new Eldorado was the shore to which was wafted on its restless tide all of the reckless and adventurous spirits of the south and east. Gamblers, adventurers and men of all kinds for whom society had no partieular use came herein droves. Among this class was a man named Jack Allen. Jack kept a notorious saloon at the foot of Santa Fe avenue, which is still within the recollection of the earliest inhabitants. Soon the tide of emigration poured in, and Allen, with the instinct of his class, finding that laws were beginning to be enforced and his ill-gotten gains proportionately lessened, "pulled up stakes" and sought a new base of operations farther on the frontier. The place he selected was a point on the old Santa Fe trail, some twelve miles south of Raton, N. M., where he took up land and established a ranch, which became at once the stage station and general resort of cattle thieves and desperate characters generally. Some time afterwards, about sixteen years ago, Allen died, whether "with his boots on" is not known, but certain it is that one Jack Stockton, a notorious horse-thief and bad man generally, who originally came from Texas, took possession, and the place became widely known thereafter as Stockton's ranch. At that time the trade of cattle stealing was not attended with as much danger as at present, and Stockton's soon became the headquarters of as desperate a gang as ever cursed the western frontier, and Stockton, by common con- into the realm of knowledge; that which sent, became the leader and chief. Shortly after coming in possession, with a taste that can hardly be accounted for in view of his surroundings and associates, Stockton built a new house was not equaled at that time by anything in Colorado or New Mexico. It was two stories in height, built of stone with a veranda running entirely around it, both on the first and second floors. It was located in a grove of cottonwoods, and was considered marvelously handsome at the time. The character of its owner and its frequenters, however, did not change, murderers, outlaws and thieves of every kind found in it a safe refuge from terrors of an outraged law. Among its regular guests was a notorious character whose real name was not known, but who was always addressed as "Chunk." Chunk was one of Stockton's most expert cattle thieves, and when drinking was cruel and dangerous. One day, having imbibed pretty freely, he started out on the trail, bent on mischief. Arriving at Trinidad he gave vent to his murderous instincts by riding his horse directly into a crowded saloon and which was a marvel of elegance, and shooting right and left as he went. The terrified men present fell back from the monster as he advanced, but not till two of them were shot dead and several others wounded. After performing this feat Chunk turned his horse and rode out without being molested, the overawed people getting hastily out of range of his shots. A deputy sheriff with a posse soon started after the murderer, and pursed him as far as Stockton's but upon arriving there were informed that he had not been there and were compelled to return without the miscreant. Just at this time a man named Allison, also from Texas, who was the owner of considerable cattle in the neighborhood, whose character was fairly good in the community, but who was known to be a dead shot and a dangerous antagonist, came into town from his ranch. Upon being informed of what had happened he said:

"I'll get him," and refusing all offers of assistance started on the road south on a leisurely trot. Traveling all night he reached Stockton's the next day just before dinner. Putting up his horse, he carefully scrutinized the premises, but without discovering any signs of Chunk. Soon the dinner hour arrived. and, seating himself, Allison shortly saw his man enter from a side door, revolver in hand. Upon espying Allison, whom he knew, his suspicions were at once aroused, and from that moment the men never took their eyes from each other. The only vacant seat was by the side of Allison, and Chunk took this, placing his revolver in his lap. Then followed a scene that was peculiar as it was thrillingly interesting. Each while pretending to be absorbed in the meal watched each other as a cat would watch a mouse, and watch a mouse, and several times Chunk made a feint by dropping his occur?" knife, meaning, while stopping to seize watched him so closely that he could have her ears examined." not find an opportunity to carry it out. Finally he repeated the ruse and something in his eye convinced Allison that last week and-" discharged his weapon under the table at his enemy. Chunk fell back in is what most men desire, but to keep his chair dead, while blood gushed in torrents around him. The ball which he had fired just missed Allison, passing through his coat immediately over his heart. The latter, not in the least discemposed at the terrible result, resumed his dinner, after completing which he coolly saddled his horse and rode rapidly to Trinidad. Upon arriving there he told the officials that he had not brought Chunk with him, but if they wanted him they could easily find him.
