

ALBERT STARK IS KILLED

WORKMAN IN THE NORTHWESTERN MACHINE SHOPS.

STRUCK ON NECK WITH LEVER

Was Lowering Engine Tank When Lever Slipped Out of His Hands and He Received Blow on Neck That Caused Fracture at Base of Brain.

(From Saturday's Daily.)
Albert Stark, a workman in the Chicago and Northwestern machine shop, received injuries at about 5 o'clock last evening, from which he died at 9. No very definite account of the accident can be secured, as no one was present when it happened. Stark was working on one side of an engine tank while another workman was on the other side. The tank had been raised on jack screws and the men were lowering it to the trucks, when Stark's companion called to him but received no answer. Going around the tank the other workman found Stark unconscious, and all efforts by his companions failed to revive him. It is supposed that in letting down the tank the handle of the jack screw slipped away from him and struck him. He was taken to his home in the eastern part of the junction where he died about 9 o'clock without regaining consciousness.

Dr. Holden, the attending physician, discovered one small mark on the man's neck, just back of the jaw, where the lever struck him. The blow caused a fracture at the base of the brain, death following from internal hemorrhage.

The deceased was about thirty years old, and leaves a wife and two children, one about three and the other one year old. He had been with the company but a short time. Mr. Stark came here from Ponca, where his people live, while his wife's parents reside at Pierce.

Arrangements for funeral have not yet been made, pending the arrival of relatives.

After marriage he located on a farm near Beemer and engaged in farming and sheep raising. In May, 1887, he purchased the name of the paper to the Antelope Tribune, and ran it as a prohibition sheet. In March, 1898, he purchased the Yoeman of T. H. Pollock, and then discontinued the publication of the Tribune, and devoted his entire time and energy to the dissemination of populism.
