Reason or Instinct?

Dr. Mackay in World-Herald: Norfolk, Neb., April 18.—Before Mr. Burroughs had told us that animals do not reason, that they perform no acts not necessary to their needs, I fondly believed that mind was a thing of kind from the protoplasm to the poet.

modern philosophers have the better of the argument.

Science has not yet discovered the local habitation of the mind nor has it been able to separate it from the motor and sensory regions of the brain and therefore we must confess at the outset that we are working in the dark speculating regarding the mental processes that govern the acts of the brute creation and our conclusions may be erroneous.

Modern naturalists tell us that the law of action which enables the creature to build a nest, a dam or a web is instinct and is innate and not an acquired faculty.

Therefore if its intelligence was of the same kind as the mechanic it would respond to education and could be taught forsooth to even write poetry and because the bee keeps on imitating its predecessors its mind is a thing different to that of the mechanic.
