BLACK JACK ISRAEL, THE BOSS OF PLAQUEMINE

BY FRED C. WILLIAMS

Plaquemine, Louisiana, is situated in Iberville parish, at the point where the great government locks connect the bayou that bears the name of the city with the mighty Mississippi river. This fact gives Plaquemine an advantage from the standpoint of water-way transportation, because Plaquemine bayou connects with Grand lake, La Feuche bayou, Byrick bay, through Maimillion and Vermillion rivers the great Tish bayou, connecting up all of the rich plantations both sugar and rice, as well as cotton, and the rich wooded section producing sport teak and box, pine, spruce gum, post oak, live oak and the beautiful drooping cypress. From the limbs of these various trees dangle long streamers of gray moss, which in the moonlight, viewed from the deck of the small bayou steamers, as seen in the baton skillfully sculled by a native, gave the writer an impression of fairy land, decked in its streamers of spangled silver. Such is the country of the central figure of this story whom it is difficult to describe as the good point of Joseph Israel of Plaquemine, Louisiana, are many and perhaps some might think elusive.

He is hotel owner, saloon keeper, politician, laborer, agent and philanthropist. He is a small man in stature, standing five and one half inches in height and weighing about one hundred and five pounds. He has a soft, yet penetrating voice, sharp nose, thin lips, rounded chin, small forehead, small piercing black eyes, which have the peculiar habit of narrowing to slits when Jack is studying a new advantage and twinkling brightly when anything amusing is said. And as to his complexion, anyone who has seen him would say he is white, but if you ask Jack as to what he is racially, he will always answer "black," meaning that he is an American Negro, and he emphasizes the black, hence the name Black Jack, which he accepts readily and without comment.

Every plantation owner, every logger, every swamper, every fishing boat owner, every oyster dredger, every steamboat man, in search of labor always applies to "Black Jack." Every man seeking help, sympathy, charity or a job applies to "Black Jack." He supplies the employer and makes nothing but verbal contracts, the main specification being fair treatment and fair pay to the men. He is often called upon to settle disagreements and grievances, real or imaginary, between both employer and employee.

In the little town where he resides and at the saloon which he operates, during the course of a day, week, month or year, he is visited by men from every walk of life, and Solomon like he gives out his decisions in a fair justice-loving manner.

He distributes his charity in an unostentatious way and claims no credit for doing so; and when called a good man by some aged man or woman, whom he has helped or from some appreciative man, who through Jack's political "pull" is freed from the courts, he will answer in that inimitable way peculiar to himself: "That's nothing; anybody can do that who has a mind to do so."

Turning to me after pushing a man from the door who had ordered the third drink in less than fifteen minutes, which is one of Jack's most stringent rules, as he never allows a man to drink enough to get drunk in his place, he said in his quaint and yet most earnest manner: "If that fellow had been a water-man I would have allowed him three drinks, as it would take that much to get the damp out of him, but as he is only a day laborer, two was enough," and the men go away cursing him only to come back the next day to thank him.

He sits quietly back and scans his paper, and now and then casts a quick glance to the bar, that none may violate his rules, while awaiting the next visitor, which is never long for "Black Jack" directs the destiny of many men and women in the communities along this great island water way, and some day when he is missed from his usual seat in his corner, by the old style desk, and the word is whispered that Black Jack is no more, all Plaquemine will mourn.
