

Very extensive lobster catches are reported off the eastern coast of Canada. Recently the boats were taking these faster than the factories could pack them.

A Poem and a Sequel

By DORA MOLLAN

(Copyright, 1919, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate.)

When Elise Duane felt anything very deeply she invariably wrote a poem—and sold it. Her verses appeared infrequently in a certain popular weekly. Always they attracted notice and oftentimes she was asked the inevitable question: Why didn't she devote all her time to verse? If she could write like that, her path to at least moderate success was assured, and surely it must be less laborious than photography. To this question Elise always made the same answer: "But I can't write that way except when I feel a thing intensely, and I don't—often."

Back at the beginning of the war, when the first contingent, a battalion of National Guard troops, left her home town for camp, Mrs. Duane, accompanied by her small daughter, Alice, was wedged in the wildly enthusiastic, though somewhat fearful, crowd that bade them Godspeed.

A few weeks later a poem, signed with her name, was published in the periodical which had printed all her verses and which had a national circulation. It was a simple lament that she had none "near and dear" to offer to her country.

Mrs. Duane received many letters mostly from women who wished to thank the author of the poem for putting into words thoughts which they had not the gift to define. One, however, was from a man.

He did not praise the poem—simply stated he had read it, and in plain phraseology offered himself as a substitute for a "near and dear" one. "I have a premonition," the man wrote, "that I never will come back, and I am a firm believer in 'hunches.' I have no family to represent. My name is an honorable one and I have kept it clean. If you will take it, madam, and will allow me to make over to you my insurance I ask nothing in return ceived another letter from Private Pendleton. He had made his life insurance over to Alice. Surely she could not object to that. Then, too, he had a tiny income. It wasn't much, but it might help out in the days to come, when her business would be sure to suffer.

He had arranged that it be paid to her during his absence, for Mrs. Duane was to remember that even if she refused to bear his name they were still his adopted family, and, in view of the premonition, he would feel more comfortable about leaving them. The following Saturday, the letter stated, he was coming again—and it would probably be good-by.

And over this letter Elise pondered during the intervening days. Had she any right to take this big-hearted man's money? No; not for herself, surely. But for Alice? Even a "tiny" income would smooth their pathway. And in the event his foreboding proved to be justified—but here, rather to her own surprise, she found herself in tears.

That big, fine-natured man would have no one of his own name in the whole world to mourn him—no one who had a right to hang a service flag in the window in his honor!

Perhaps it was Alice's remark when her mother told her their soldier was coming to say farewell—"Oh, mother, I like him so! I wish he could be my really daddy!"—that brought Mrs. Duane to her decision; for it transpired that on that last visit she listened to the soldier's plea and became Mrs. John Pendleton.

Immediately after the ceremony the big soldier bade his "really" family good-by, and this time he kissed them both.

Then followed the anxious times that no one has forgotten. Sometimes letters came regularly. Then there were apprehensive weeks when no word came from France. The business fell off and the small income helped considerably. Daily Alice planned for the time when her daddy should return—and at the thought Elise's heart would beat faster. But it was not until the letters ceased to arrive altogether that the wife owned, even to herself, that she dearly loved her big, generous soldier husband.

Then one day, when Elise was busy in her workshop and the doorbell rang, she sent Alice to answer it. It might be the fateful bit of paper that haunted her dreams, bearing the tragic message that John's "hunch" had come true.

But this could be no telegram, for indistinguishable voices sounded from below. Alice was talking to a man. Did she call him "Daddy"? No. It couldn't be. Mrs. Pendleton trembled, however, as she arose and passed into the hall. Alice was coming up the stairs, holding by the left hand a tall soldier.

"Elise—my wife!" he cried. Then somehow that left arm was around her. Feeling her hand on his empty sleeve, he said: "You see, only part of my hunch was true, dear. Are you glad that the rest of us escaped to come home to my 'really' family? Alice is, she has told me so."

Stroking the useless sleeve Elise replied: "Somehow, I can't tell you, John, how I feel. I will write it. And none but you shall see the poem."

RELICS OF INDIAN VILLAGE

Accidental Discovery Made in New York Is Considered to Be of High Importance.

Digging for woodchuck on the outskirts of a virgin forest near Cato led to the discovery by Maynard A. Cramer, Auburn's city forester, of a buried pre-historic Indian village, largest of the several which have been excavated during the past half century in the Finger Lakes region of central New York, once the most heavily populated by Indians of any equal area in North America, says a dispatch from Auburn, N. Y., to the New York Evening World.

Bones were found a few inches below the surface of the ground and beneath them lay two skeletons of Indians, so determined by the shape of the skull. Led on, Mr. Cramer, who is a member of the State Archaeological association, excavated a large area, finding a mass of rare Indian relics in many "dumps."

For the first time in history it is believed, relics unearthed disclosed both Algonquian and Iroquoian occupancy of the same camp site. Hundreds of arrow heads, with bone awls, beads, knives, hammers, mortars or mauling stones, notched sinkers, fish hooks, picks, cylindrical pestles, pipes and broken pottery were mingled in the masses of debris which lay beneath the moss of the forest.

Beside one skeleton was charcoal, believed to have been used in thawing out the ground in winter, that the Indian might be buried. It is estimated that the village was occupied about five centuries ago.

For Those Born in January.

People born in January are favored so far as strength, intelligence, and health are concerned. That is the conclusion arrived at by Dr. Mario B. Boldini, one of Italy's greatest scientists, who, as a result of investigations, has discovered that men born between January 1st and March 21st are stronger, taller, and superior in intelligence to those whose birthdays fall in other months. This view is borne out by the researches of another Italian scientist, Deela Rovere, who found the proportion of children of inferior intelligence lowest among those born in January and February, and highest in August and September.

ETHICS.

A tangled web—this life, and weaklings we Strive to surmount this low estate—our tears Unheeded fall, and cold relentless Fate Pursued his prey thro' countless, unknown spheres. Be not too swift to judge the erring one, You know not what conditions held control; Long ages past ancestral sins begun Decried his destiny ere he became a soul.

But in each man is born a part of God No matter what his base and carnal state, Some early find this glory of the soul And you, others wait too late!

There are sweet depths beneath the surface dross, And you can sound them if you only would; The inner longing of the heart of Man Is for the Right and for the final Good.

But what is "Wrong," and what, alas! is "Right?" What mind can find the line between the two? Is God or law or inner man the light Upon the just and proper thing to do?

Oh, come with me afar from haunts of men, Come to the sea, roam thro' the woody glen, Pluck lovely flowers, sport with the fragrant breeze, Loll on the heather 'neath majestic trees; Commune with children, join their bubbling jest; Play freely, labor with an equal zest.

And ere you perceive it, the question of Right Fades away like the whispering shadows of night.

—Eva Alberta Jessye, Morgan College.

To Platinize Silver.

Place some platinum in a small quantity of aqua regia or nitromuriatic acid, and keep it in a warm place a few days; it will dissolve. As soon as it has dissolved, evaporate the liquid at a gentle heat until it is as thick as honey, so as to get rid of the excess of the nitric and muriatic acids. Add a little water, and it is ready for use. A dozen drops of this solution goes a long way in platinizing silver. The operation is performed in a small glass or beaker, covered with a watchglass to keep in the fumes, and placed in a little sand in a saucer, to equalize the heat.

Talk happiness; the world is sad enough without your woes.
