Your Problems

Martha Allen

Dear Martha Allen: I have been going about with a girl for about a year. I have never kissed her, nor have I made known my intentions because I am not in a financial position to talk seriously upon the question of marriage. I love this girl with all my heart though I have never told her in any way. I do not want to hold her to a promise when I have no right to do so. What shall I do? JIMMIE.

First thing to do is to take stock of yourself and decide as to the prospects of your future. If you feel that you are capable of getting ahead there is no reason why you shouldn't discuss the future with this girl. When it is very likely that you will go on caring for this girl, the next step is to tell her about it. It is her affair as much as yours and she has a right to some of the decisions if she is to be your wife.

Sometimes a girl needs to stabilize her affairs by knowing that someone is working for her sake. You should have a conference with her. Give her the privilege of deciding whether or not she is ready to wait for you to make good and to make ready to marry her.

Olive: Bread and butter plates are used for most every meal now. They are cleared from the table when dessert is served.

Alice: At an afternoon reception you might have chocolate or tea, sandwiches or small cakes. Sometimes people prefer coffee, so it is well to have it. Candies and nuts are sometimes added.

Ora: After leaving a house where you have visited for a week or more you should write a letter of thanks. It should be written within two or three days after departure. It need only be short.

Adele Garrison "My Husband's Love"

Who is the Masked Person That Starred at Madge?

That Harry Underwood would remember my inordinate liking for seafood I was sure, and I therefore was not surprised when after an hors-d'oeuvre of anchovies and caviar, the waiter brought clam cocktails, followed by cups of steaming clam broth. The portions of both appetizers and cocktails were smaller than the ordinary, and I recognized another special touch of my escort's. A dinner he orders has a number of courses, but all the earlier ones are curtailed in quantity, while their quality—and novelty—are accentuated.

But it was when the third course came on that Mr. Underwood's sparkling eyes and expression, like that of a benevolent Sunday school Santa Claus, told me that he expected me especially to enjoy the contents of the silver-covered dish which the waiter served as if he were performing a rite.

"Oh! Roasted escargots!" I exclaimed gleefully. "Wherever did you find them? I haven't seen any—"

"Harry is Reminiscent."

"Since the war," Mr. Underwood supplemented, with a triumphant smile. "Neither has anybody else to speak of. But there's a genuine French chef in the kitchen here, and wherever there's a French culinary expert you'll find snails."

"Don't call them that," I said with a petulant little shudder. "It dulls the edge of my appetite."

"Pardon?" He grinned mischievously. "But you ought to have a soul above the alphabet. D'y'e remember how Dicky and Lil used to glower while you and I reveled in this course?"

"I don't want to," I retorted, as I began the delicate task of extracting the tempting roasted morsel from the tiny hot shell. "If I did, I should remember Dicky's comments on the dish and probably send half my portion away-untasted."

"He had some vocabulary, the old Dicky-bird!" my husband's oldest friend said reminiscently, and then after a little silence, he spoke abruptly: "Them were the times, old gal! Them were the times!"

There was an intonation in his voice which caused me to look at him sharply. Was it possible that he regretted the folly which had cost him Lilian's wifely comradeship, even though romantic affection never had entered into their union, or was his repining simply a wish for the return of the social evenings which he, Lilian, Dicky and I used to spend together?

"Shall We Dance?"

I was at a loss for a reply to his apparently flippant little speech, and took refuge in as apparent an absorption in the escargots. When he spoke again it was to voice some laughable, low-toned comment upon an oddly assorted party of diners near us, and when the course which had so delighted me was finished, he gave a direction to the waiter to delay the next course and, rising, held out his hand to me.

"Shall we dance?" he asked, and for perhaps ten minutes, which, to my surprise, I found all too short, I renewed a pleasurable experience which I had not enjoyed since Harry Underwood's path in life diverged so sharply from that of his wife and his most intimate friends, Dicky and me.

Dicky used to say there was no better dancer in the universe than Harry Underwood, and in the old days I shared his opinion. His step was perfectly fitted to mine, and when dancing with him I always forgot the animosity against him which generally lay deep in my consciousness.

He had lost none of his skill, I found in the first few seconds of our dance together and deliberately I put away from me the protests my Puritan conscience was frantically trying to register upon my mental retina, and gave myself up to the enjoyment of the moment.

It was upon our fourth round of the floor that I became conscious of eyes following me. It was a rather sub-conscious sensation, but I always heed the psychic little warnings, and I furtively turned my head toward the direction from which I had felt the glance.

From beneath my eyelashes I saw the dias upon which the cabaret performers waited between their turns.

A group of dancers whose faces were concealed by masks stood there, and I knew that the eyes of one of them were fixed upon me.
