

SOCIETY AND WOMAN'S PAGE

Adele Garrison "My Husband's Love"

The instructions Lillian gave made about the mysterious parcel.

So I was to be the "tall slender young woman" who was to call someone in a taxicab for the mysterious "silly blue-black one with two long braids," concerning which Lillian had been telephoning so frantically!

I had suspected that I was to be her messenger when she had first telephoned the mandate to get the queer object she wished within an hour if it were in the city, and this second message had confirmed my suspicion. Therefore, when she turned from the telephone with her perfunctory query, I was ready with a cordial affirmative.

"I shant mind in the least," I said, "Tell me just what I am to do."

"Wait until I call a taxi," she said, and telephoning an office I did not know, she stipulated that a special driver named Brown be sent to the apartment.

Lillian calls a taxi.

"It will take a few minutes longer, but I shall know that you are perfectly safe," she said, and I surmised that the man Brown was one of the numerous people in many widely differing occupations scattered throughout the city who were on the emergency roster of the government secret service, and whose aid Lillian could enlist at any time.

The call completed, she hung up the receiver, wheeled to face me and for a long minute eyed me steadily.

"I know I sound like the fifth episode of the serial," she said at last, "but this stunt is necessary, bizarre as it seems. At that, it is a preparation for an emergency which may not develop, but I can't afford to take any chances."

I put my hands upon her shoulders, and returned her earnest look.

"You surely need not explain to me," I said quietly, "You ought to know that I am ready to do anything to help you at any time."

"You will wear your blue suit and hat," she began, "and take the taxi to this address."

She held out a penciled memorandum to me which I took mechanically. "Just Get the Package."

"As he draws up to the door, an undersized man with reddish mustache, will step out into the street to the side of the cab. Ask him if his name is Jones, and if he has a package for me. He will then give you a small package which you are to bring as soon as Brown can drive you here. You'll just have time to get into your suit."

Characteristically she did not ask me if her directions were clear to me, and I knew that if she had seen me standing in the doorway during her telephone message, she would not have given them to me, but would have assumed that I mentally had jotted them down, as indeed I had. Before she had finished, therefore, knowing that she wished no delay, I was fumbling at the knob of the bedroom door.

"I'll change to my suit in no time," I said in a low tone.

"You might as well shout if you wish," she returned, "Twenty men with twenty saxophones—she grinned at her own atrocious pun—could not awaken our sleeping guest."

I echoed her words as I switched on the light and hastily changed to the blue tulle-trimmed suit Lillian had stipulated. Mammie lay in an ungraceful heap with her mouth wide open, snoring. There was no more sign of awakening at the light or my movements than there had been when Lillian had flashed the powerful light into her face.

"Is that what you'd call 'sleeping the sleep of just'?" I inquired as I returned to the living-room, after changing my clothes and closing the bedroom door upon the stertorously slumbering Mammie.

"We are 'perfect ladies,' both of us, my dear," Lillian's affected falsetto set me to laughing. "I should think you'd be very long if my lips should utter or your pure ears should hear what I really call Mammie's slumbers. But there's your taxi. I told you you'd just have time. 'No,' in answer to the gesture of mine, "you won't need any money. That is all arranged for. Just get the package and bring it back to me in the best time you can make. Good hunting!"

The last words floated out to me through the hall door, for I had hurried away, knowing that haste was the one thing which for mysterious reasons she required. But even though I hurried like mad, Lillian reached the street door at the same instant I did.

"You didn't think I'd take a chance on its being the wrong taxi man, did you?" she inquired quietly, but something almost intangible in her manner gave me the quick suspicion that the thing she was taking no chances on was the possible appearance in the office of Grace Draper.

Your Problems

Experimental Mind.

Dear Miss Allen: I will soon be out of my teens. I have been going with men of my own age for five years. Some were very reckless, "fast" we would term them now. Others were entirely different. I've had a wonderful time. But I've come to the place where I must decide once and for all: Should I let a fellow whom I think quite a bit of (as a friend only) put his arm around me? I have argued the question for years. I have thought it over as best I can, and can come to no satisfactory conclusion. After all, why sacrifice all momentary pleasure for a pleasure somewhere far in the distance that one might have anyway? I've done it just a few times, and how I have enjoyed it! I've been rather conservative about it, because it's worthless if one isn't. I'm saving my kisses for the one man, because I think he deserves something beyond and above that which others get. But am I doing wrong in getting just a wee thrill out of life, an inexpressible enjoyment, when I am careful about who the fellows are? One fellow even told me he would never think of marrying a girl who had never known anything of "being loved up a little" because she would be too inexperienced and might even be rather cold. Personally, I have found no harm in it and have been happier because of it. I certainly have never had the reputation of being "soft" and hate the word. If I can go about my work cheerfully, happier because I have had a few little thrills; if I do my best for the world and for others, and at the same time know these little privileges—in the sight of even the most religious and moral, can it be wrong? Why were we made that way then, to enjoy such things so

Women's Relief Corps Conventions.

Leaving Saturday for Boston to attend the annual convention of the national Women's Relief Corps and the Grand Army of the Republic will be Mesdames Ida A. Miller, G. W. Longacker, Otto Baysdoffer, Louise E. Ellis, Emma McCarty, and the Misses Ann, Ella and Maud Crawford, Emma Malone and Nell Anderson. The annual convention will be held August 10 to 18.

From the George A. Custer No. 82, Women's Relief Corps will go Mesdames Kathleen A. Anderson, president; Sarah E. Gardner, secretary; Florence Stone, publicity chairman; and Grace Houghton and G. Bowie.

Return Letters Unopened.

Dear Miss Allen: I am receiving letters every day from a boy I care nothing at all about. But still he insists on writing to me. How shall I stop it? JANE.

Return the letters to him unopened.

Golden Hair.

I would advise you to send your stained dress to the cleaners. You might spoil the garment if you attempted to get the stains out. Look in the phone book under "Quilting Shoppe" for the place you are interested in.

Happy But Wondering.

What an experimental mind! You seem so well satisfied with your own conclusions that I wonder you ask my advice. I will concede that a girl might extend the liberties you speak of and still seem to "get by" without any harm. She might be happy, forfeit nothing in self-respect and less particular about the hulloaloo about a little "petting."

I can only answer you in general terms. I cannot answer a general question and cover all cases.

In general, then, it is far better for a girl not to extend petting privileges. She loses her sense of discrimination, gradually becomes less and less particular about the boys to whom she grants these privileges, and less and less particular about the kind of liberties they take. Carried far enough, that means a loss of self-respect and loss of respect from the young men themselves.

If you are interested in good books, I might recommend Phillips Gibbs' latest novel, "Heirs Apparent." This writer develops nicely the point that young people of today think they can subject themselves to any test and still remain fine and strong. But his characters suddenly discover that they are human beings after all, and have all the emotions which human beings have possessed since the world began. They see clearly, all in a burst, that the old safeguards and conventionalities which have been thrown up around young people have been given for a reason, and are not as foolish as they at first thought.

Your own sureness reminds me of a character in this book. Read it and write me your opinion of the young people in it.
