"My Husband's Love"

The Way Madge Did Lillian's Strange Errand.
Lillian's hand rested lightly on the arm as we walked from the street door to the waiting taxi, and she did not take it away until, with a satisfied nod, she had recognized the chauffeur.
"Good. Fine, Brown," she commended, and the man touched his cap with a pleased look upon his shrewd, weather-beaten face. He was a man of perhaps fifty years, stocky of build with hands and arms that looked capable of handling wild animals.
"You will take Mrs. Graham to address," she said, handing him a similar penciled memorandum to the one she had given me, "and will bring her back when she had finished her errand. She will not get out of the car under any circumstances."
He looked at her attentively, and suddenly I realized that I was practically a prisoner in the taxi until I should return. For a second my gorge rose at the idea of being put in a position of a child traveling on a railway train in charge of the conductor; then my fondness for Lillian and my trust in her smothered my wrath.
Madge's Destination.
My intuition told me that she was abnormally conscience-stricken at sending me out at such an hour on so bizarre an errand; and she meant to omit no precaution against anything happening to me, either by accident or—far-fetched as the idea appeared, yet I was sure that it was in her mind—by any attempt of Grace Draper to injure me.
"All right, ma'am," Brown replied, and the next second Lillian had stepped back toward the apartment building, and the chauffeur, with trained skill, was guiding the car through the after-theater traffic.
We had gone but a few blocks when he suddenly swerved off the avenue to the side street and drove down until we reached a region of rather frowny-looking shops, now deserted for the most part.

Scanning the numbers carefully, he drew up before one which bore so many names and legends that I had difficulty in deciding that the principle business of the people within was theatrical costuming.
As Brown stopped the taxi a man suddenly emerged from the darkness shrouding the old-fashioned arway by the side of the steps and came close to the side of the cab.
"The street light showed me that he was a slight, under-sized man with a reddish mustache; also that he held one hand behind him. Evidently he did not mean to betray that he had a package for delivery until he was sure of the person addressing him. Remembering Lillian's instructions, I leaned forward and asked in a low voice:
"Is your name Jones?"
"That's my name," the man replied, shifting from one foot to the other a bit nervously.
"Have you a package for Mrs. Underwood?"
He brought his hand from behind his back. It held a small, compact parcel not much larger than a bon-bon box.
"Here!" he said and thrusting it into my outstretched hands, turned and was swallowed up by the dark arway.

Brown looked around at me inquiringly. I answered the unspoken question promptly.
"That is all of the errand," I said. "Please drive back to the apartment where we left Mrs. Underwood."
He touched his cap and threw the car into first—he had left the engine running during my colloquy with the man of the arway—and in even less time than we had taken on the outward-bound journey we were back in front of the apartment building.
Brown made no move, however, to open the door of the taxicab when he halted the car. Instead, he sounded three short blasts of his auto horn, and, following his eyes to our lighted windows on the second floor of the building, I saw Lillian wave a signaling hand from one of the windows, which I noted was wide open, and then move back into the room.
Brown turned his eyes back to the front and sat still in the most approved position until a few seconds later Lillian appeared at the door of the building and beckoned to him.

"All right, Brown," she said, and at the word he sprang to the ground, held open the door and followed me up the steps to the door where Lillian stood.
Lillian put a bill into his hand with a word of appreciation, and then he was descending the steps again, while I held out to Lillian the innocuous-looking package about which she had thrown so melodramatic an air of mystery.
her without seeming to mean anything by it. I was extremely annoyed the other evening by a man much older than myself whom I had just met. He patted me on the back and hands several times and once during the evening he grabbed me. I really don't like it and yet I don't want to make a fuss and seem foolish about something well meant.
ELLSIE.
A man has no right to maul a girl and I would certainly find some way to avoid a repetition of the treatment you describe. Either draw away in such a manner that the man will know you are trying to escape his touch or else tell him frankly you would rather be refrained from such demonstrations.
There are men who take a girl's arm, or touch her hand without meaning it as a familiarity, but I am inclined to think that in most cases they are quite conscious of their conduct. Assuming that they are, a girl need not be too hesitant about showing her resentment.
Too often women are afraid of being considered prudish, or of being laughed at because they are too particular. You've heard of the man

Your Problems
Martha Allen
Show Your Resentment.
Dear Miss Allen: What can a girl do with men who put their hands on who was loved for the enemies he had made. Well the girl who is laughed at because she resents being mauled, need not mind. Every laugh is a song of praise for her courage and good sense.

Dear Miss Allen: I am 17 and deeply in love with a boy 3 years older. He says he loves me. And yet I know he kissed another girl. Should I break our engagement even though I still care for him. He asks me to forgive him.
PUZZLED.
Did he kiss the other girl after he told you he loved you? And does he promise never to do this again? I would advise you to forgive him this time, but my advice might be different if he erred again.
Girl Was Right.
Dear Miss Allen: I go with a young man whose sister is also my chum. Last week my chum and her mother both invited me to stay all night at their house after I had spent the evening there. I telephoned my mother who allowed me to stay but the next evening when I was home my father scolded me and made a big fuss about it. He said it wasn't proper and that I should never do it again. Do I deserve such severe criticism?

DOT.
No, I think you do not. Your mother gave her consent and your chum's mother invited you. I think you did nothing wrong. Your father of course was worried because you stayed at the home of the young man who is interested in you. It was only your father's love for you and his desire to have you regard propriety that made him angry. You should not have a family quarrel over the affair. Talk it over and agree if you think you should, that you shall not stay there over night again.
Southampton wore prints in and out of the water over last week-end.

One of the partners of the Excello Shirt Company decided to withdraw from the business. In order to simplify reorganization, the firm decided to convert all shirts and contracts into cash. The Brandeis Store, known throughout the United States as an outlet for vast amounts of merchandise, was approached with an offer so low that our buyers could hardly believe it. THE RESULT IS—THIS GREATEST OF ALL SHIRT SALES.

You Know Excello Shirts—They're Perfect—They're Thoroughbreds
The best materials textile mills can make, the best patterns established designers can produce, the best style men's fashion authorities have designed, the best tailoring skilled workmen can achieve. At these low prices a POOR MAN can buy all he wants—a MILLIONAIRE CAN'T buy BETTER SHIRTS ANYWHERE.

Our Former Sales Set Omaha's Record—This Sale Is Going to Break It!
More salesmen in attendance
More cashiers, more bundle wrappers
There are more shirts in this sale
More floor men, more charge account clerks
More space devoted to the selling of them
More express elevators to Eighth Floor
Than have ever been placed into service in a Single Sale in this store before.

Shirts will be arranged on tables according to size and price. There will be ample service for every customer. Just step onto the Express elevator. It will whisk you directly to the Eighth Floor where you may make your selection from shirts of your size only. Make your purchase and get away without loss of time.

Come early Saturday—come prepared to buy better shirts than you've ever bought at these prices before. You can't expect too much because you can't imagine better shirts than Excellos. Buy by the dozen, for your judgment will tell you that you won't have another opportunity like this in many a moon.
