"My Husband's Love"

The Why Lillian Rushed Madge and Mollie Fawcett Away From the Apartment.

Mollie Fawcett and I filed obediently after Lillian as she almost ran down the front stairs of the apartment building.

I was in front of Mollie, and I was unaccountably conscious that the girl's eyes were fixed upon me during our brief progress to the door. The realization broke upon me that even as I was covertly studying her, she secretly was watching me, and the question "Why?" loomed before me as vividly as the danger signal at a railroad crossing.

Lillian's hand was upon the door when a husky voice from the rear of the hall called:

"Oh, Missis Underwood!"

Glancing down, I saw the old janitor, Schwartz, bucket and mop in hand, hurrying toward her. He put down the implements of his early morning cleaning before he reached her, and when next he spoke his voice was what he fondly believed to be a whisper, but I distinctly caught several times the words "trunk" and "check."

Lillian gave a hasty assent to his whispered confidence and dismissed him with a hearty:

"Thank you, very much, Mr. Schwartz."

What is Lillian's Plan?

This sent the old man back to his work beaming upon the world and me in particular. I smiled cordially at the rotund old chap as he exuberantly greeted me, but my eyes and thoughts were upon Lillian. There had not been the slightest flicker of her eyelids toward me as she talked with the old janitor, yet I knew that she would have given much had I not been near enough to overhear his whispering.

I realized with a sudden acceleration of my pulses that neither my trunk nor the costly fur garments, which Mollie Fawcett had brought to Mamie's home, that Mamie had induced Katie to hide for her in the farmhouse attic, and which I had rushed to Lillian, were anywhere in our apartment, or I should have seen them.

Lillian, with the aid of Mr. Schwartz, must have sent them to some place of concealment. And yet in both our minds there was a strong suspicion, amounting almost to a certainty, that the goods did not rightfully belong to the people, whoever they were, who had made lovely, youthful Molly Fawcett their messenger.

Why had Lillian done this? With an annoyed little jerking back from conjectures, I grimly reminded myself that if I remained on the mental track to which I appeared to have switched my brain, I should be nothing but an animated interrogation point after the word "Why?" by the time we reached the farmhouse.

But with the determination to let no thoughts enter my mind save those involved in making the journey home as safe as my care could accomplish, I walked to the side of my car, in which Harry Underwood was seated, with the intention of depositing my bag in the tonneau.

"Did I understand?"

He was out of the car, hat in hand, before my hand had touched the door, however, and, taking the bag from me, placed it in the car. Then, he turned back, with a charming bow to Lillian, and stood patently awaiting an introduction to Mollie Fawcett.

With her lips quivering into a sardonic little smile, Lillian nodded almost imperceptibly to me, and then turning her back upon us, went to Mollie's home.

Mollie Fawcett's eyes had followed mine, but she had not waved, evidently thinking that the gesture of farewell was all for me. But her voice was filled with unconscious youthful curiosity as she asked diffidently:

"Did I understand you correctly, Mrs. Graham? Was that gentleman's name Underwood?"

With sudden, unreasoning irritation, I said to myself that there was no reason for me to enlighten her very patent—and natural—curiosity concerning the identity of the man and woman we had left upon the sidewalk, and I had hard work to keep my voice from curtness, as I answered laconically:

But I need not have feared further questioning from Mollie Fawcett. She gave me a poised, indifferent "Thank you," which yet subtly told me that she had understood and accepted the rebuff, and spoke no more for the remainder of the drive through the city traffic.

YOUR PROBLEMS

Martha Allen

Is a Stenographer a Personal Servant?

Dear Miss Allen: I am 20 years old and am a stenographer in a downtown office. I am a graduate of a business college and good in my work. I come from a nice home and have friends anyone would be proud of. I have been successful in my office work.

Now my trouble is this: My employer expects me to keep his pencils sharpened, fill his ink well, dust his desk and sometimes even run on a personal errand. I always resent these tasks. Of course, I have to do them, or quit. But I wish I could feel right about it. I don't consider myself menial. I want to believe I am valuable for my brains and not as a dustwoman. SALLY.

Well, Sally, I know how you feel; but there is a finer way of looking at this matter than the view you have.

It isn't the task one does which goes him, but the spirit of himself and the one for whom it is done.

Imagine carrying a cup of cold water to a wounded soldier. What glorious service! How your heart would throbb with joy at the privilege!

Imagine having to carry a cup of water to a crude, demanding, unappreciative master. Slavery! Ignominy!

Now, there are men, I confess, whose desks I would not care to dust. They are the conceited, dominating, small-minded kind. But I would resent just as much taking shorthand dictation from them as doing anything else. It would be the daily contact in office service which I would not like.

On the other hand, I believe I would cheerfully sharpen a busy man's pencils if he were kind and appreciative, especially if I thought it would leave him freer for the knotty problems with which a busy business man has to struggle. I would feel that I at least should not worry him with my "ideas," being there to help him with his work, primarily as a stenographer, but actually in any reasonable way. There is nothing a poor employer dreads so much as the "touchy" girl whose feelings are always being hurt.

No work is undignified, you know. A woman may scrub a floor and yet be queenly, if she is queenly. Work cannot demean you. You can only demean yourself by being un ladylike, coarse or inconsiderate.

Does this help you?
