

Paris---Where Everybody Owns a Car

By O. O. McINTYRE.

Strolling along the Rue de Rivoli you may see a jaunty little car pull up at the curb. The occupant might be a prominent lingerie merchant or he might be a ragpicker.

In Paris there is no class distinction when it comes to owning a car. The rich and the poor brush fenders, so to speak, on all the well known boulevards.

Paris streets are fairly acrawl with millions of these tiny kitten powered

The average automobiles in France could be parked in a bathtub--if there were any bathtubs.

autos. Most of them are Citroens--the flivvers of France. They cost about $150 and go more than 40 miles on a gallon of gas.

Any busy Paris street resembles a flood of cockroaches in the kitchen sink. And the constant squeak of the funny motor horns reminds you of an election parade back home.

Paris is a heavenly paradise for the motorist, for there are no observations of speed laws and no traffic policemen to send you to the curb, hawl you out and perhaps give you the w. k. and justly famed ticket.

Parisian motorists have the freedom of the highways and there are fewer people plumped in the pistol pocket than anywhere else on the globe. And there's a reason.

If you are careless enough to dispute the right of way with an auto and the next moment discover yourself in the gutter looking silly and listening to the birdies tweet you don't get sympathy. You get jugged.

So it is when you see a pedestrian jumping like a rabbit and his hair imitating a fright wig you know that he is only saving himself from a dent in the anatomy but also a stay in a cute little cell.

Delicatessen clerks go to work majestically in their cars as well as the grand dams goss shopping in her mauve limousine. It is not a badge of wealth to own a car, but a sign of poverty not to own one.

The average automobile of France can be parked in the bathtub at night. But what a comic statement that is. Just as though there is a bathtub in the republic. Voila!

Americans who are going over there to soak up a little culture--and a little Montmartre after dark--are buying their own cars and after they get ready to return home they attach them to their watch chains as souvenirs.

Autos are so thick there I am convinced you can take a stick and flush a flock of them out of almost any Frenchman's whiskers, to say nothing of a cover of meadow larks and a few flying squirrels.

And, O, yes, most of the chauffeurs in Paris have luxuriant beards. A photograph of any one of them could be placed in the Louvre with a tag reading "Parasite Behind a Hedge" and you'd think it was a regular picture.

There is the one person car that is just about two inches from being a kiddie jar. It is liable to run under your chair while you are enjoying an aperitif on the terrace of a sidewalk cafe.

These cost $100 and I imagine are hung up on strings and sold like knitted gloves at the old general store.

The gendarmes are very clubby with the motorist. Along the Champs Elysees it is not unusual to see a motorist draw up to a safety platform, offer a gendarme a cigarette and exchange a bit of gossip. Try to do that in New York and you'll be having somebody hunting for a ball bond.

Shopping for an auto in Paris is very amusing. I stepped into one automobile salon near Rue Royal.

"Monsieur," I said to the salesman, dropping into my French and crawling right out again, "what have you in the way of a little runabout for man and wife?"

"Four Monsieur?" he inquired.

"Very poor," I replied, revealing the anemic portion of what had once been a very healthy traveler's check book.

"Non, Non," he exploded, shaking a wicked set of whiskers, recently dyed red, but beginning to tarnish around the edges.

So I tried out a little Latin that I had picked up in the Latin quarter, but we got nowhere. Then being rather handy at pointing I pointed to one of his midsize autos.

"Ah-h-h-h! Oul, Oul, Oul!" he shouted. And he picked it off the shelf, dusted it off with a whisk broom and told me to get into it. And that, my dears, is a good trick if you do it. Such fun, My! My!

It was not very handy getting in and out of things. I once broke an arm getting out of bed, but I wasn't going to back down. So I swallowed a couple of times, took a hitch in the suspenders and made the effort. I could see the home town papers: "Local Boy Gets Head Caught in Paris Auto."

Getting into a Paris flivver is like crawling into a section of sewer pipe. And foremost, I wriggled and squirmed, heard two vest buttons plop and wasn't even in.

Well, finally my feet touched the brake and accelerator, but I was sitting on the back of my neck and had to peep over the dashboard to see anything in front of me. So like my motoring sitting up and so there was no sale, but we parted good friends and I asked him to come to see me sometime.

The cheapest thing in Paris is the taxi. This is despite the fact that gas is more expensive than it is in what we globe trotters quaintly nickname "the States."

You can ride all over town for a quarter and if you give the driver more than a nickel tip he marks you as a yokel and you lower yourself in his estimation. And, of course, you wouldn't want a taxi driver to do that.

When you hop into a taxi they dart off like a bat leaving Hades or some other summer resort. If you rap on the window and motion for a little less of the Oldfield he shrugs his shoulders and snaps into a higher speed.

And he is a bear on turning corners. He generally makes them on one wheel and throws in a laugh to boot. One day I left my hotel to go to the Arc de Triomphe. I can always get there by making a motion like a circle with my hand. That's about the only place I visited for 10 days.

You might have thought the hounds of hell were loosed and chasing this bird. Finally I rapped for him to stop.

"See here," I said, "I'm not going to a fire. Cut out that speeding."

"Oul, oul," he said and kissed me on the cheek right out there in public. Then he got in and went faster than ever. Playful fellows, the little whiskered rascals.

The one person taxi is even cheaper. You almost blush when you pay your fare. But the wear and tear on patience in dealing with the French driver is terrific. From the neck up you behold pure pyraline.

No matter where you ask to go you are taken some place else. If you may start out to see the Eiffel tower and draw up at the Cafe de la Paix. Then you begin all over again with the same result. If you really want to get somewhere, walk.
