Mrs. Towle Meets Prince and Princess Cantacuzene

Sponsors Chicago's Latest Fad, a Huge Black Hat.

THE tiny comfortable hat has been superseded we hear by the scoop-brimmed black felt, which smart Chicago women are sponsoring for luncheons and deb teas.

Mrs. Ross Towle returned last week end wearing one and is so convincingly attractive in hers that the new fad is an assured success.

Mrs. Towle is trimmed in black chenille in a most unobtrusive design, for these hats must sacrifice elaboration to keep the wearer from looking too heavy, she says. So thin-brimmed are they that they scarcely threaten the perky silhouette in vogue.

Meets the Artistic Colony.
Mrs. Livingston Fairbanks, Mrs. Towle's Chicago hostess, moves in an artistic set which is unrivaled in the metropolis for its brilliancy.

Your Problems

by Martha Allen

Diana Is Jealous.
Dear Miss Allen: I am writing you for consolation. I'm utterly miserable, although I may not seem to have any serious reason for this depression.

Although there are persons who do not believe in luck, I think luck plays a great part in life.

I, for instance, was born unlucky, while my sister is the luckiest person you ever came across.

Now she goes out with my friends and doesn't invite me to join her. I feel she doesn't want me along.

Perhaps if I lived away from my sister I could be happy. I was away from her for a while and then I had hosts of friends and enjoyed myself because I was always first—at least as far as relatives are concerned.

How discouraging for you, Diana, to believe that happiness and success, friendship and love, are merely a matter of luck.

But do you actually believe this? Or are you fooling yourself into thinking that you believe in luck because it's easier to pity yourself than make the effort necessary to better things?

Now, suppose you snap out of this theory of good and bad luck.

Your letter discloses that you are the victim not of luck, but of your selfishness, jealousy and growing hatred. They tear down, but they don't build up. They repel—never attract. Drive them out of your life or they'll drive away every friend you have and destroy your health, beauty and charm.

Replaces the destructive qualities that are making you a failure with the quality of harmonious, friendly good will. Make yourself as dainty and beautiful as you can. Watch your thoughts to keep them good, kind and kind. If your friends are more fond of your sister than of you, why worry? Rather be very glad, for you also love her.

Friendliness, good will and the gaiety that naturally accompanies them are altogether lovable. When they control your thoughts you'll find that people are attracted to you as steel to a magnet, flowers to the sun. Your craving for friendship and love will be abundantly satisfied.

A Wife's Confessional

Adelle Garrison's New Phase of REVELATIONS OF A WIFE (Copyright, 1924.)

The Plans Madge Swiftly Made to Go to Mother Graham

I stood dazedly staring at Dr. Pettit while he recounted the meager details concerning Mother Graham's accident which he had just received over the telephone from Edith Fairfax.

Subconsciously I knew that I must pull myself together, but it was not until he had told me that I had better prepare for a journey to Marvyn that I was able to assemble my brain motor and set it to functioning.

"What about Junior?" I asked, even as I touched the bell to summon Katie.

"Leave him here with Katie and Jim," he responded promptly, and then I caught a sudden furtive glance in my direction. "Or, no," he said a bit hesitantly.

"Perhaps it would be better to take him with you. His grandmother might wish to see him."

The measured words were like a blast of cold air from a suddenly opened door. I knew, of course, what was implied. Dr. Pettit knows how Mother Graham's life is bound up in that of her idolized grandchild, and that Junior's would wish to see if—all others she would wish to see if— I whirled upon the physician with a suddenly insistent demand.

"You mean there is danger of her dying?"

He raised an imperatively protesting hand.

"You know very well there is always danger as the result of such an accident to a woman of her years," he said reprovingly.

"But as I told you, I do not anticipate any such result from the information I received over the telephone. However, you would be the first to reproach yourself if you did not take Junior and there—should—be—need of him."

"Poor Mudder Graham!"

"Oh, of course!" I cried contritely. "And I will get him ready at once." He consulted his watch, and made a mental calculation.

"I can spare 20 minutes," he said. "If you wish, I will sit here near the telephone, so that there will be no delay in answering should Miss Fairfax telephone again."

"Thank you so much!" I murmured with a fervent sincerity I never had thought to use again in addressing Herbert Pettit, and rushed away with Katie, who had not answered the bell until our colloquy ended.

"Not happen?" she asked anxiously as soon as we were beyond the sight and hearing of the physician, of whom Katie stands in wholesome awe.

I explained briefly, and she stared at me with a suddenly blanched face.

"Not I tell you yesterday morning when you were here?" she demanded with eyes in which I saw gleaming the superstition that is inextricably woven into the emotional fabric of her life.

"You remember you say 'something nice for her last meal'?" I know when you say those words do the safer, never come back by us again. Oh, poor Mudder Graham, and I bin so bad by her!"

Mother Needs Me—
Katie's apron was on its way up to her face, and her eyes were already brimming with her ever-ready tears.

I knew that I must shut off the emotional faucet at once, or she would be no use to me for the next half hour, so I employed Dr. Pettit's tactics, even though I felt a superstitious chord in my own nature vibrating to the girl's absurd plaint.

"You're being bad to her and to me, now," I said sharply. "Mother Graham needs me, and I need you to help me get ready. If you're going to waste time crying—"

The apron dropped, and Katie dug resolute fists into her eyes.

"If no make foot of myself any more," she promised. "But you shoost remember vot I said."

With a violent effort I kept myself from shrieking at her to be quiet, but the remembrance of how sorely I needed her services in the next half hour helped me to silence, and I was rewarded by such swift, efficient service as only Katie can give.

By the time the telephone again rang, Junior and I were all ready for the journey, and Katie and Marion were busily packing their separate bags.

I had decided that Katie would be an invaluable addition to the Durkee ménage in the emergency which had so suddenly confronted us, and of course I could not leave Marion behind, even if I did not count upon her to take the care of Junior completely off my hands.
