"Hold her! Hold her!" But the ground crew couldn't hold it. Ten gobs, swinging with desperation to a guy rope were swept from the earth. Then with a crackling sound which made one think the entire vessel was going, the rope snapped in two.

An instant later 150 men released their hold on the other ropes and the vessel which conquered the Atlantic was going rapidly southward. Again it was brought back, Down to the 300-foot level again.

A window in the control cabin forward opened and a voice megaphoned:

"Hold her now-hold her, I'm going to valve her." And "valve her" he did. The helium, the most precious gas known to mankind-poured out of its cells in invisible torrents. As gently as a baby nestling against its mother the giant craft of the air sank to earth. The presidential party went through the ship, while disap-pointed hundreds were thrust back by secret service men. As they passed through the cabins they must have noticed a tall man clad in a tight leather coat who wore a cap with the letter "Z" blazoned on it. He stood there at attention quietly, saying nothing. But throughout the day he had said much-and on many other days.

That man was Kurt Fleming, onetime commander of a Zeppelin in the kaiser's army, and a man who holds the world's altitude record in the lighter-than-air service. Today he was the "officer on the bridge." who under Commander Klein's authority navigated the vessel over Philadelphia, Wilmington, Baltimore, and into the heart of the Potomac country. For half an approached, smiling and saying: 'We've hit some very bad airin fact, we just dropped 300 feet." But the drop was so imperceptible that a guest dozing on a lounge didn't even awaken.

At 5:35 Commander Klein signalled "fly home." Again it rose gracefully. Gradually, bit by bit, it reached 1,500 feet, then moved calmly overt he Washington monument and disappeared into the shades of night.

As it passed from sight one memory remains very clear—the picture of that lithe German with the "Z" on his cap, standing motionless in the control cabin peering out into the night. On such a night not so long ago he bombed his nation's enemies. But tonight he was merely a guest officer, laying the course toward the home base for a ship which had just been christened by the first lady of the land.
