

CAMERA SCOUTING IN SHADOW OF NORTH POLE

These remarkable photographs, made by Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Kleinschmidt of New York, were taken on the north Siberian coast at 18 degrees, or about 1,000 miles from the north pole in country that has been trod by only two white men before. The country is inhabited by Eskimos of the Innuvit and Mozinka tribes. Photos copyrighted by F. E. Kleinschmidt, from P. & A. photos.

Mr. and Mrs. Kleinschmidt, center, with Eskimo guides standing over one of their fallen prey, a polar bear, which they brought down after a long and thrilling chase.

Two Eskimo women with Mrs. Kleinschmidt (right) during a hunting trip. The Eskimo women are as brave and as adventuresome as the men folk and accompany them on many of their hunts.

Some of the Eskimos in the hunting party preparing a meal outside of their igloo after the hunt.

The explorer and his wife in polar garb, with an icy background.

Members of the Kleinschmidt hunting party dragging out of the icy water a polar bear which they brought down with arrows, and which had toppled into the water after being struck.

Mrs. Kleinschmidt fixing tresses of one of the Eskimo maidens while the others wait their turns in the cabin, where Mr. and Mrs. Kleinschmidt lived during their trip.

Party of Eskimo guides with Mr. and Mrs. Kleinschmidt, in smaller canoes, during a hunt for wild animals. One of the Eskimos has already spotted his prey and is aiming his rifle to get it.

Mrs. Kleinschmidt, standing above others on right, happily watching members of her hunting expedition eating crabs, which they caught during the trip and which they seem to be eating with much relish in their igloo.

Mr. and Mrs. Kleinschmidt standing over one of their big prey, a walrus.