Your Problems

By Martha Allen
Cares for Another Man.

Dear Miss Allen: I have come to the point where I don't care for anything or what happens to me because the whole world is against me. I was only 16 when I married and thought that I cared a little for the man. I do not hate him and I do not love him. He is 14 years older than I am and I know that he loves me.

In the summer I met a man that I love with all my heart and soul, but I know that there is no chance of ever having him for my own because he is married and has two children. I told my husband about this man wanting me to leave with him and everything that happened between us. But he begged and pleaded with me to stay with him. My lover has been parted from his wife for three years and he says that he doesn't care for her any more. This man has shown me that he cares a little for me. If I must give him up I don't care what becomes of me. It is a miserable life to live with a man you do not love when you can't have the one you do love. Please tell me what to do. Should I go to my lover or stay with my husband? I am afraid that I might jump out of the frying pan into the fire.

THANK YOU.
You will be shocked when I tell you that you are a very selfish woman and that as long as you consider your own happiness only you will be miserable. When you were 16 you chose a husband you did not love, and now instead of appreciating his goodness to you, you heartily confess a love for another man and admit that you would prefer to try your luck with him—except for the fear that you might be as bad off and as unhappy as now. You claim to love the other man with all your heart and soul, but I wonder how you can lay claim to either when you so bluntly break the heart of your husband. If you go away you will learn what it is to suffer. The man you love is not honorable and would prove faithless to you. Then you would wish a thousand times you had appreciated your good husband. It has been said that the garden of love needs watering. Let me assure you that if you make an unselfish effort to please your husband and spend more time appreciating the blessings he brings you, you would find yourself caring more for him. Happiness must be earned through unselfishness.

Worried: My dear, you will always have trouble, and I won't be able to advise you out of it if you don't treat people with more consideration and expect them to treat you with more respect. If the first young man was taking you to the theater he should have sat beside you. That was inexcusable in him, and your conduct in leaving him later and going with another boy was no better.

Sugar Will Blend Flavors.
If you find that the flavors of different vegetables for a stew or salad do not seem to blend, add a tiny bit of sugar. This usually helps. Add a few grains at a time until the proper taste is secured.

Madge Is Mystified by Mother Graham's Actions.

I stared at Lillian's young daughter as if her winsome face were an oracle from which I could extract the meaning of the odd tale she was relating to me.

I had put down Mother Graham's talk of disgrace coming to Junior through her, and her demand for $100 to be forthcoming by Tuesday, as the impossible farrago of a brain slightly disturbed by the shock of her fall. But this encounter of the children with the mysterious tramp who appeared so familiar with the name of the family made it terrifyingly certain that I was facing something more substantial—and unpleasant—than dreams, even though they were nightmares.

But this story of a tramp who appeared to be familiar with the family history, had a sinister aspect which chilled me. Experience with Lillian's work has taught me to recognize things which otherwise I never would notice, but I felt that it took no unusual insight to smell blackmail of some sort in this particular incident. But how could Mother Graham—an elderly woman of blameless life and the highest ideals—have anything in her life upon which a blackmail could fasten? There was but one answer. She must be shielding someone. Who?

Something deep within me shied away from the answer instinctively. I knew that I did not wish the answer to the question as yet, and to smother the insistent suspicion which was trying to voice itself, I interrupted Marion's story with a question.

"Why did you wait to answer him, Marion?"

"I didn't," she answered, wide-eyed. "As soon as he said about Junior being Richard's child or Elizabeth's"—she quoted exactly the phraseology she had heard—"I started to run away with Junior. But Junior tugged away and faced the man—the cutest thing you ever saw, Auntie Madge!

see him, and he was hurrying awful fast. Then I heard you call, and I answered. Oh, Auntie Madge! You don't think Junior has taken cold, do you? But truly, I couldn't think of anything else to do."

"I think you're the bravest, most resourceful girl I know," I said, kissing her warmly, "and even if Junior has taken cold—which I doubt—you don't know what might have happened if you hadn't hidden him that way. Come into the house, and I'll get you some clean clothes and give you both a good rub down and Katie will fix you up some hot milk. I'm sure you'll be all right."

We recalled Junior from his delightful romp with Mrs. Durkee's cat and made our way up the backstairs to the room the children had occupied with me the night before. When they were rubbed and dressed except for the final fastenings which Marion could manage for both of them, I went down the stairs again to get the hot milk which is my panacea for many ills.

Katie was still in the kitchen, although the waffle irons were no longer in use, but my little maid's brows held a portentous frown, and I knew that something had displeased her. I ignored the familiar symptoms, however, and asked her for the hot milk.

"No matter," she asked alarmedly. "Ees dot babies boy seck?"

"No, indeed," I answered cheerily, "but he fell down in the mud and got his clothing damp and muddy, so I thought it would do no hurt to give him something hot to drink."

"Milk no good," Katie returned, with her racial scorn of anything so mild. "A good steck in it, now, or some coffee."

"I think we'll take the milk, Katie," I said. "You heat it and I'll get the cups from the closet."
I moved toward the door of the "butler's pantry" which divided the kitchen from the dining-room of the old-fashioned house, and as I went through I thought I heard an expostulation quickly smothered, from Katie. But I paid no attention to it—she is always exclaiming over something, but when I pushed back the swinging doors, I saw that the opposite doors were partly open, and through them came the voice of Edith Fairfax:
"I think you ought to tell her, Dicky. It isn't fair to her to let things slide along this way."
