Your Problems Solved by Martha Ellen

Dear Martha: While reading the Martha Allen column "Lonely Lass" I think I am the man's wife she speaks about, and must say I do love my husband and have asked this girl to quit him, but it did no good. Anyway, the girl my husband goes to see is a Catholic girl and a blonde. I can't see what a girl can think of that will deliberately come between husband and wife and take the father away from two little ones, also their only support. Not only the three adults will suffer, but the babies also. My husband has repeatedly tried to get this girl to leave Omaha with him. He is 13 years older than she is. When she is in her prime he will be old and gray-headed. If she would only stop, think and take this before her God or her priest, he could convince her there is no happiness when you must steal another's husband. Then, if a husband will not live true to one wife, what can the girl that gives herself and honor to him expect? I am praying my God to show my husband the right way before it is forever too late. Please print this, so "Lonely Lass" may read and maybe it will send her before her God in prayer. HEART-BROKEN WIFE AND MOTHER.

A Wife's Confessional by Adele Garrison

Katie's Jealousy Flares, But Madge Pacifies Her.

When I caught sight of Lee Chow in a seat of a coach in front of mine on the early Long Island eastbound train, I stopped so suddenly that if I had not caught at the seat I should have been thrown to the ground. It was no part of my plan to let him know that I had discovered his close espionage upon my movements. I guessed that he prided himself, oriental fashion, upon his ability to achieve invisibility—when he chose, and I was most unwilling to hurt his vanity. Therefore, I retraced my footsteps as rapidly and quietly as possible, waiting until I had reached the door before glancing around again at the Chinese. He still sat in the same crouching posture, and I opened and closed the train door with infinite caution and returned to my own car with the hope that the faithful chap had not seen me.

If it had not been for the accident of Lillian's old acquaintance with the hotel clerk, the news of Lee Chow's inquiries would not have been brought to us and I never should have thought of connecting him with the muffled, sleeping figure beside the driver of the taxicab. This accident he in no wise could have foreseen, or I knew he would have adopted other means for keeping watch over me.

Because I always accord all Lillian's theories the utmost respect, I spent most of my time during the journey to Marvin in coming over her warning concerning the Chinese. My common sense reinforced her arguments, but my intuition pleaded so hard for the man who claimed to be Hugh Grandland's servant, that by the time the train reached Marvin I had made up my mind to continue the trust I had put in the oriental.

Madge feels safe. He was nowhere to be seen as I stepped off the train, and there was no taxi to be had at that early hour. It was still dark, although the sky was breaking into gray in the east, but I had no fear as I started down the village street, for I felt assured that somewhere near me was a patient, devoted figure, stealing noiselessly along.

Luckily, I had a key to the Durkee house in my purse, and so awakened no one with my entrance. I went first to Katie's room at the top of the house, finding her already astrid. She gave a little scream when she saw me, which I promptly smothered by clapping my hand over her mouth, a gesture which I always have in readiness for Katie. She nodded her head violently as an earnest assurance of her silence, and I took away my hand and spoke to her in a whisper.

"Everything is all right, Katie, but I have to leave here in an hour and a half, and I want to take Junior with me. I'm going to meet Mrs. Underwood and Marion with the car at Forest Hill at 9, and take them out to the farm. You will stay here until Mother Graham is able to come back to the farm, which ought to be only a day or two now. Then I shall come after you both. I want you to get some breakfast for Junior and me at once, and then come up and help me get Junior ready for the journey."

Katie's Astonishment. Katie gazed at me wide-eyed for a long minute, while she pondered my news.

"Who goes' cook for you and Misses Underwood and dose kids?" she demanded.

Prudently, I kept Mrs. Ticer's name

COLOR CUT-OUTS Jack and Jill

AT THE WELL. Here's the old-fashioned well to which Jack and Jill go after water. If you read the story every day and color and cut out the pictures at the end of this week you will have a whole set of "Jack and Jill" paper dolls.

"Well, here we are," said Jack, stopping to get his breath at the top of the hill. Then he started turning the handle which would bring the bucket up out of the well.

Quickly he filled Jill's pail and they started back down the hill, both of them taking a firm hold on the handle.

"Careful!" warned Jill. "The hill is slippery." But her warning came too late. Jack lost his balance and slid, Jill, holding onto the pail, went with him. (Color the old well brown and the wooden pail yellow.)

Parking With Peggy

out of my reply. There is an old feud between the two capable house-keepers which has afforded us much amusement.

"What nonsense, Katie!" I laughed. "Mrs. Underwood and I are neither of us invalids. We shall manage all right until you get here. Don't worry—but—hurry. I need you here, now not at the farm."

Katie chuckled with returning good humor. "You've got, Missis Graham," she said. "Worry—hurry? Dot goot. All right, I feex. Ha! Ha! 'Worry—hurry'!"

I left her repeating the senseless little rhyme and hurried down to my mother-in-law's room, finding her already dressed and sitting by the window, looking out. The face which she turned to me at my entrance was so filled with misery that even her astonishment at seeing me did not banish the etched lines of sadness from her features. But I knew that I had a wonderful diversion for her thoughts in the story I had to tell her of Lillian's protege. I crossed the room swiftly and took her into my arms.

"Lillian has a big piece of work on hand," I said with apparent breathlessness, "and wants you and me to help her."
