Don't—Girls

Don't neglect your hair.
By Edna Wallace Hopper

My hair is luxuriant, thick and lustrous. It is finer far than 40 years ago. I have never had falling hair or dandruff, never a touch of gray. Today, at my age, it remains my greatest glory.

The reason is this: Years ago I consulted great experts on the hair and scalp. They made for me what they considered the utmost in hair help. They have since added to it even better discovery.

They put it up for me in concentrated form. I apply it with an eye-dropper directly to the scalp. There it combats the hardened oil and dandruff which stiff the hair roots. That is essential. Let those hair roots clog and smother, and the finest hair will fall and wither.

That is clear to you as well as me. Then why not do as I do? Why neglect a beauty factor so precious as your hair?

Now I have placed this same hair help at every woman's call. The name is Edna Wallace Hopper's Hair Youth. All druggists and toilet counters supply it at 50c and 85c.

See how it attacks the enemies of hair. How it tones and stimulates. Watch how hair begins to thrive when given half a chance. Just as flowers in a well-kept garden.

I shall gladly send you a small bottle to try if you will mail this coupon. Do this now if you count your hair important.

Your Problems Solved

In Love With Two Men.

Dear Miss Allen: I am engaged to a poor young man, but he has a very bright future. We are to be married Easter. And now the trouble begins. I find that I am in love with his dearest friend, who loves me very much. He would not tell me for a long time I suspected from the first. Now I love both these young men, but I love the friend more. What shall I do?

I cannot break my engagement for fear of breaking my fiancé's heart. On the other hand, I imagine I would be very unhappy with him.

BRIDE-TO-BE.

Surely you do not intend to marry a man you do not love. That would be even more cruelly unkind to him than to yourself. He is giving you all of his love and he has a right to expect all of yours in return.

Of course, he will be deeply hurt when he learns that you no longer love him. But you owe it to him and to yourself to tell him the truth at once and save serious unhappiness.

Make very sure first, however, that you do not love him. Are you sure your infatuation for the friend is more than a passing impression? If you are positive you love him more than your fiancé, break your engagement at once as graciously as you can, taking, of course, all the blame.

Lonesome for Good Times.

Dear Miss Allen: I am a girl of 20 and away from school. I find it very hard to mingle with boys here and I always feel out of place in their presence. Before I came away I went "steady." I don't want to forget the boy at home, but I would like to be able to have good times like other college girls. I don't feel happy in the presence of boys. Please advise me how to overcome this awkward feeling.

LONESOME SAIL.

Don't shrink within yourself merely because it would be easier than to attend social functions. Force yourself to be alert and interested. At first it may be hard, but as time goes on you will feel less and less awkward and will make friends. I do not mean that you should do as the crowd does if that would be lowering your standards of right. You can be a good sport without being cheap. I am sure that all you need is practice in mingling.

Does He Mean It?

Dear Miss Allen: While on a vacation I met a man two years my senior. I have been out with him often, and he comes to see me. He has repeatedly told me that he loves me, but I am at a loss to know whether he means what he says.

I know I am beginning to love him, but would not want to fall in love with him and then find that he was not true. He is 26 and I am 24, so we ought to know our own minds. Do you think I can put any faith in what he says?

M. E. G.

Hold onto your heart until you're positive that he loves you—that his expressions of love are not merely an impulse, the result of passing fancy. Continue to enjoy the friendship, but don't give up other men friends, and don't regard him as more than a friend until he asks you to be his wife.

Little Snow-White

This is one day's chapter of the famous story of "Snow-White." Today you will read about her adventure in the forest, children who follow this story every day will have a whole set of "Snow-White" paper dolls.

Snow-White looked about the little house into which she had run for shelter from the dark forest. Everything seemed very small, but quite neat and dainty. In the middle stood a little table with a white cover over it, and seven little plates and seven little mugs upon it. Against the wall were seven little beds ranged in a row.

Suddenly she heard steps outside and through the window she caught a glimpse of some one coming. At once she trembled with fright, and ran to hide behind a closet door.

Here's the strange looking dwarf Snow-White glimpsed through the window. Color his suit and cap brown and his little jacket bright green, with a red and green scarf and black beard. What will become of little Snow-White? You'll find out tomorrow.

Marion Shows Her Inheritance of Courage.

As Lillian had predicted, the rush of crisp autumn air past our speeding car, revived the girl who lay at most as if unconscious within the supporting circle of my friend's arm. We had not reached the eastern boundary of Jamaica before she stirred, sat up, and spoke in her monotonous tones.

"Where is the widow?" she said.

"It was the question which she had asked several times since she had been deserted upon the transcontinental train. The intonation of the query was far different from that of the voice in which she had demanded my name when she had first seen me, and that which invested her comment of a few minutes before, "But this isn't his car." It was as if a heavy curtain separated the former existence of the helpless victim of amnesia from her present state. This instant seemingly occasionally parted ever so slightly, then closed tightly again.

I heard Lillian's reply, spoken casually, indulgently, as one would pacify a fretful child.

"She had to go away for a little while, but she will be back again soon."

The answer was surprisingly prompt and emphatic, compared with the monotone of her previous utterances.

"I don't want her to come back. I don't like her."

"Then you need never see her again," Lillian declared promptly.

Luckily the road was comparatively clear, for I was not paying the attention to my driving which it needed. My physical eyes were upon

A good looking SUGAR

THE objection a housewife often has to what she calls "poor sugar" is that it is coarse. Coarseness of grain in itself does not affect a sugar's purity, but it does affect its appearance. Great Western Sugar is a good looking sugar. It is noted for its evenness of grain, its luster, its sparkling whiteness. That reputation has been earned only by increasing care in manufacture, improved methods and adherence in every Great Western plant to the highest standards known in the industry. It has set a standard for purity—99.9 per cent—unsurpassed by any sugar on the market.

While not an expert driver, she handles the car well, and she inherited her mother's resourcefulness and initiative. Therefore she did not need my low command to take the wheel. No Sediment in Alamo Milk

Make this test today with a bottle of Alamo milk—you'll find it pure and white clear to the bottom.

Ordinary milk is merely strained through a filter cloth—Alamo milk is clarified.

This means that all Alamo milk passes through a Clarifier, one of the newest scientific dairy appliances.

The principle of the Clarifier is simple—the milk spins around at the rate of 8,000 revolutions per minute—this causes any foreign matter to collect in the center. The milk, thoroughly clarified, pours out at the top and goes on to be pasteurized.

You see the principle of the Clarifier in operation on a small scale every time you stir your cup of coffee rapidly. Try it with a cup and a spoon and, remember, the Clarifier revolves 8,000 times a minute.
