Your Problems

By Martha Allen
Friendships Grow.

Dear Miss Allen: Is it wrong for me to go to dinner with a married man who comes here every few months from out of town? I know he is married and he doesn't make love to me. We have dinner at X and then go to a theater together. My family think I am doing wrong. Am I?
SUSAN.

Yes, I am afraid you are doing the wrong thing. Perhaps not doing wrong, but doing something which is inadvisable. Friendships grow, and there is danger you will care more for him, or he will for you, as time goes on. This would mean sorrow for somebody.

But even if that shouldn't happen, you are cutting yourself off from eligible boys of your own age. They will not understand your friendship for this married man. They will have a right to believe you prefer his society to theirs. And, gradually, you will be left out of a circle you might otherwise have to enjoy.

There might be nothing to criticize in your friendship for this married man, but I would sincerely advise you to stop making regular engagements with him. It is an injustice to yourself.

Awkward: Awkwardness is nothing to be terrified about. Physical awkwardness can be overcome by exercise and earnest effort to co-ordinate muscle and impulse.

Now just what is the belief about the mentally awkward person who spoils things for herself or is her own "jinx"? It must be that she gets her fair share of "even breaks" from life, but that she manages to turn them away from their normal course.

You can't go wrong by doing nothing. Most of your ill-luck has come from what you have done. Try the other method. Sit tight, and let the same "Lady Luck" who brought your opportunities to you unfold them for you.

Any girl who can stand off and take a good look at herself and see that she is to blame for most of the failures she has made so far, can almost be glad for the failures. She has learned a lot from them. She has experience on which to draw, practical example by which to profit and the good humored honesty to stand and declare.

"My Husband's Love"

The Reason Madge Promised the Gang to Keep Quiet.

For a dazed second or two after the nonchalant agreement of the gang leader to the proposal to murder me, I stood motionless and so horrified that if it had not been for the grasp of the brutal hands upon my arms I believe I should have fallen to the ground.

I never have believed much in the visions of the men are supposed to have, but I know that in this flashing instant the picture of my small son crying for his mother again, flamed against my eyes as if it had actual power to dash them.

Then, like a dash of cold water flung into my face, common sense came to my rescue.

Desperate, lawless though these men might be, yet surely they were not so devoid of ordinary prudence as to risk the electric chair by killing a woman for no other reason than my possible knowledge of the furs which Mamie had hidden in the farm house barn, and which I was taking with her to New York.

"I Will Go Quietly."

Detain me they undoubtedly would.

and also take Mamie and the furs away from me. I knew that I probably would experience discomfort, that my return home would be delayed and that my opportunity to take the furs to Lillian would be lost, but I told myself, insistently trying to bolster up my own courage, that these things were the worst that could befall me.

Fighting off the impulse to scream I twisted my head away from the coat which one of the men was preparing to throw over it, and addressed the leader:

"I will go with you quietly," I said tersely. "There is no need to gag or tie me. But you are the leader of these men, are you not? At least you appear to be the man best fitted for leadership, and I have something to say to you alone. I do not think you quite know who I am, and just what the consequences of 'bumping me off, as you put it, may be."

The man looked at me keenly, and I saw that the bit of flattery had reached him. Whether it would aid me any or not I could not tell, but at least he made a disarming sign to the man with the coat.

A Tortuous Ride.

"I haven't any time to spiel with you now," he said roughly, "but if you'll give your word not to open your mouth unless I tell you to I'll lay off the gag."

I gave the required promise eagerly, but, as if regretting his lenient impulse, he only growled sullenly as he turned away.

"It don't matter much, if she opens her mouth, Bob, but her ever the head. Here, Frank, you get into her car with the other girl and so over to Bill's garage. We'll follow you speed of the truck slackened to a crawl and I heard the sound of doors pushed back. Then we rolled onto a smooth floor, stopped, and there seemed to be much jockeying of the big machine into some required position.

"All right," cried a raucous voice, and to my astonishment and momentary terror, the truck, carrying the myself with it, appeared to rise slowly into the air.
