To Live With Monkeys.
More Politics.
Klan, Rum, and League.
Many Kings Did It.
By ARTHUR BRISBANE

Here's one original thought. John Grimard, citizen of New York, writes to the Franklin Park Zoo in Boston, saying he'd like to be exhibited in the monkey house, with the other primates, "to show the public how much man resembles the ape, in accordance with the Darwinian theory."

Some who live in the open spaces, Texas, Washington, California, Florida, etc., will probably suggest that if all New Yorkers adapted to demonstrating the Darwinian theory were locked up in the zoological garden there would be many vacancies in Fifth avenue and at Newport.

The best way to study man in connection with monkeys, if there be any connection, is to look at a row of skeletons, beginning with the lemur, going up through the lower and higher apes to man. That's enough to make you shiver.

It should be remembered, however, that the difference between men and monkeys is far greater than the resemblance between men and monkeys. Most encouraging to W. J. Bryan and others who hate the Darwin monkey theory is the statement attributed to Hurley: "The difference between a highly developed white man and one of the lower savages is greater than the difference between the savage and a blade of grass."

If that's so, how far is man from the monkey?

Speaking of monkeys, the great democratic convention will soon be starting in New York. Some faces that will have a great deal to do with deciding whom democrats shall vote for are interesting faces. To be more explicit might be offensive.

Some wise politicians say that Al Smith has no idea of being nominated for president. His power in the convention hall will be great enough to guarantee for himself the vice presidency.

Part of the alleged plan is to nominate a southerner—Underwood, Josephus Daniels or Carter Glass, Underwood preferred, by the Smith crowd.

Putting a southerner at the head of the ticket would overcome the objection to Al Smith in the south. Putting Al Smith in for vice president must add enormous strength to the ticket in the north—enough to carry New York anyhow. That's the story.

McAdoo, arriving in New York with a whole trainload of friends from the west, expresses only deepest sympathy for his opponents. One McAdoo man from California said:

"McAdoo is the only man running for president of the United States. All the others are running to beat McAdoo."

The ordinary little American, trying to raise his family, pay the bills, buy a house, make ends meet, will wonder, feebly, when he learns that the "three big issues" in the democratic convention are: The Ku Klux Klan, rum and the league of nations. He thought there were some other problems.

The league of nations is a long distance off. Rum, the little man can't afford at present prices, even if he were foolish enough to drink it. And the Ku Klux Klan is "something else again."

Here's a question for practical democrats to ask themselves. And then suppose McAdoo borrows an idea from Roosevelt and decides to run independently, with the labor following that he has?

Would McAdoo do it? Human nature being what it is, why shouldn't he? He has the personal labor following, why not find out how big it is anyhow?

A 14-year-old girl in California set fire to the Hope Development school, near Los Angeles, to "set the girls free and let them have a good time." Her idea caused the deaths of 24, burned alive. Everybody will condemn that. As severe a punishment as the law allows for a girl of 14 will be inflicted.

Yet emperors, kings, and here and there financial magnates have set fire to entire nations by starting wars, and not to "set anybody free to have a good time," but merely for their own aggrandizement. Those criminals have been called heroes, and monuments have been erected to them.

A woman will represent the "wets" in the democratic convention and demand a "wet" plank. Many millions of women will represent the "drys" in millions of quiet homes. And that's what counts.

Women, in the end, will decide about having so-called "absolute prohibition" with plenty of bootleg whisky, or trying the experiment of relatively harmless light wine and beer, with the suppression of whisky.

It won't be settled for a long time yet.

A war veteran in the Canadian army weighs 440 pounds now. He weighed 192 when he fought for his country. He demands a pension because wounds he received in war are responsible for his being so fat and helpless.

Excessive fat is a disease, and it has many symptoms, not least of which is that proper weight depends upon that mysterious process, metabolism, which builds up food into living tissue and then breaks down the old cells of that living matter to replace them with new ones.

A wound or anxiety, the hard work of a housewife, any one of a hundred causes, may interfere with metabolism, thus causing excessive accumulation of fat or excessive thinness.
